SPSU plans for parking deck addition

Adam Myers
Staff Writer

With the recent commotion over the shortage of parking spaces caused by the reconfiguration of the South Marietta Parkway entrance, Southern Polytechnic State University is looking ahead in its planning of a new parking deck to be built on recently-acquired land on the west side of campus.

The proposed 800-space, $15.3 million structure is the centerpiece of a $34.4 million dollar infrastructure project for construction of new parking facilities at several University System of Georgia schools, including Dalton State College, Gainesville State College, and DeKalb Technical College.

The Facility Group, a firm headquartered in Smyrna, is the program manager for the project, while Atlanta-based H.J. Russell and Co. were selected to lead development and construction on the new facility January 15.

The parking deck is one part of a planned expansion onto the property of the former Elk's Lodge immediately west of the current campus, which was bought by the university in 2006. Also planned for the space are new buildings for the Mathematics department and the School of Engineering Technology and Management.

Because state and federal grants cannot be used for non-educational facilities such as parking, funding for the new deck must be handled and approved separately from the neighboring academic buildings.

Currently, the project is to be funded by a bond issue by the Georgia Higher Education Facilities Authority and a gradual increase in student parking fees.

Although a raise in SPSU's current $25 parking fee for students would still be considerably less than other USG schools in the Atlanta area, the possibility of commuting students having to share use of the deck with visitors and faculty has raised some eyebrows among both students and officials.

"My main concern is that the deck should go to the students whose fees have paid for it," says Kevin Moss, Student Government Association president. "It is not economical for someone to pay 100% for what he can only use 80% of."

Although the increase in parking spaces proposed by the new deck are not an immediate necessity - when completed, the reconfiguration of the South Marietta Parkway entrance will result in a slight increase in total parking - the addition is vital to provide the framework for future growth of the university. The contracted firms for both the parking structure and the Engineering building are planning a joint survey of their site sometime within the next month, after which plans will be finalized and groundbreaking can begin.

The Facility Group has set an aggressive timetable to the facility, aiming for the structure to be ready for occupancy by Spring 2009.

Spanish professor explores study abroad options in South America

Jason Berman
Staff Writer

The month of December was a flurry of activity for Dr. Bernice Nuhfer-Halten of the SIS Department, culminating in a two-week visit to Argentina and Chile to inspect the universities there for possible study abroad programs partnering with SPSU.

Professor Nuhfer-Halten's first stop was Buenos Aires. As her flight passed the Brazilian border into Argentina, she encountered her first surprise. "I had expected to see the vast, open Pampas," she recalls, "but what I did see was a lot of land divided into parcels, most of which looked like fields of ripening wheat. Everything looks well irrigated and richly healthy."

Once customs were cleared, she was treated to a detailed description of the dozens of distinct neighborhoods of Buenos Aires by their Uruguayan cab driver. She also received a concise report on the local economy (which is just now recovering from a recent crisis), and finally a sustainability campaign currently being waged to save the Argentine rainforest and the indigenous peoples who live there.

On the ground, Nuhfer-Halten observed that, "the city looks generally run down." The people however were another story. Gorgeous women and equally handsome men were everywhere. Plastic surgery is practiced there on a vast scale, and some cosmetic surgery is even paid for by the State under the country's system of socialized medicine. Advertisements for beauty products are visible everywhere there.

While the population of Buenos Aires has somewhat of a reputation—like Parisians have—of being arrogant and surly, she found no evidence to support it. Rather, she found the people to be, "open and friendly, and generally unflappable." As far as dining, she observed that, "the food choices in restaurants are European and Argentine. Pasta and cow."

Since it was close to her hotel, her first visit was to "COINED," the language institute that SPSU is currently negotiating with. Nuhfer-Halten's impression of COINED reminded her of Españolé in Madrid, yet different in having many more students and a larger facility.

"There was also an issue that I hadn't considered," she explained. "The standard familiar form of address is tú in Spanish, but not here. Everyone uses vos. The verb forms are different, too. Vos is used here exclusively, to the complete exclusion of tú. The option of having students learn tú would have to be negotiated."

Another point of negotiation would be whether SPSU would have a special course designed for our students, such as Berry College did when they had a two-week program developed for them. In this class "the students explored the Argentinean culture through the five senses," according to Nuhfer-Halten.

While at COINED, she inquired about the possibility of offering a program to SPSU students that would focus on doing business with technology in Latin America. She said that, "more discussion

Snow at SPSU

Allison Feldman
Staff Writer

At approximately 5 pm on January 16, Southern Poly experienced something that occurs rarely in Atlanta - snow, and a good bit of it. While evening classes continued, most students ran outside to play in the winter wonderland that ensued on campus. Many people who have lived near Atlanta for most of their lives have not seen snow in recent years, and a handful of students had never seen snow at all.

Howell residents especially were enjoying the layer of fresh snow. Snowball fights; snow angels, and snowmen were just some of the activities occurring under the night sky between the dorms, as much of the snow collected on the field. Others sat in their rooms, warming up with some hot cocoa while watching the snow out of their windows. As the night continued on and the snow turned to ice, the more brave souls went out for some sledding.

To many students' dismay, the snow melted overnight, meaning classes were still in session the following morning. Regardless, many students decided to not show up for class at all. There were still remnants of the previous nights' activities around campus; the snowmen that were built lasted (mostly) until the morning, and even re-would be needed if we go in that direction.”

When SPSU sends a follow-up fact-finding mission to Buenos Aires in March, the agenda will possibly include meetings with the language department and computer science faculty at the University of Buenos Aires to explore other options.

From Buenos Aires, she flew to Chile over the Andes, the backbone of South America, to inspect the COINED facility located in Santiago, and the University of Chile, one of the oldest academic institutions in the hemisphere.

The flight over the Andes was much longer than Nuhfer-Halten expected. The pilot flew over, around, and through mountain passes. Just at the midpoint of the crossing he began the plane's descent, squeezing through mountains that were higher than the plane.

“How different could Chile be? It's right next door to Argentina, right?” mused Nuhfer-Halten. “Well, if Buenos Aires is the Paris of the South, Santiago is its San Francisco.”

Chile has a mostly arid climate, and Santiago looks like California.

The COINED facility in Santiago is actually located in the suburbs. It presented a proposal for 15 students, and another proposal for students who want to go individually. The completion of a level in Spanish will require 3 weeks.

Then it was back to Argentina for a few days before returning home. Nuhfer-Halten purchased a few posters about Argentine customs for her classroom and the language lab. She also walked around to collect forms from banks and business offices for the SPAN 4001 class in professional Spanish, and other documents for SPAN 4002, Spanish Translation.

Overall, even though Nuhfer-Halten believes that the highly developed culture of Buenos Aires has a lot to offer for SPSU's students, she still views the more immediate benefit of her discussions as providing SPSU with international students from Argentina.

There appears to be greater interest in SPSU students coming to Chilean universities than in Argentina. “Either there is a glut on the market in Chile, or a dearth of students,” suggests Nuhfer-Halten.

When she returns later this year, she plans to contact CACTUS, an agency that works for schools teaching Spanish around America and Europe, to explore additional options for SPSU students.

mained for a few days after.

While people were still reeling about the bizarre weather during the week, many were shocked to see snow again three days later – that following Saturday, it began snowing a second time around 10 in the morning. While a lot of students had gone home for the three-day weekend, those on campus were able to enjoy a free day in the snow without the worry of classes. There were a lot less people in the snow this time around, but there were still some out there playing in it.

Students enjoyed more sledding during the daylight snow, especially on the hill by the I Building, and on the large mound between the Courtyard apartments and Community Center. Even after a lot of the snow had melted or frozen to ice, sledders were compacting the residual snow to keep a track for their boards and sleds.

Extremely cold temperatures for the following few nights meant that what snow stayed on the ground were kept frozen for a few days, preserving the memories from the past week. While no one can really predict when we'll get snow again, or if it will even be this winter the next time it does. Even though no classes were canceled this time around, many students are just surprised and thankful it snowed twice in one week in Marietta.

You may have noticed the new SPSU billboards that are sporadically placed along various points overlooking Highway 41. They're large, purple, and to many of us, cryptic.

What follows is a brief definition of what each of the billboards symbols mean. For more detailed information, please visit the website: www.spsuengineering.com.

More information about each program is available on the SPSU engineering website.

The first symbol, which is a hexagon with what looks like X-men character Wolverine's claws, is actually a symbol for the SPSU Construction Engineering program.

People in this major go off to design extremely large structures of epic proportions.

The second logo that appears looks like four Olympic Rings spaced evenly around each other with an eye in the center. This logo represents SPSU's Systems Engineers. These guys work in a variety of industries, including the defense, telecommunications and outer space.

The third logo to appear is a triangle with a robot in the center. This logo represents Mechatronics Engineering, a relatively new degree program at SPSU. The program is designed to teach students how to design sophisticated mechanical devices.

The fourth logo looks a lot like a warped version of the old Radioactive Shelter symbol; a diamond (sideways square) with what looks like a fan blade overtaking the center. This is the Software Engineering logo for SPSU. They are the true information Architects of the digital age.

You're doing it wrong Super Smash Bros. BAWWWWWW

Jasmine King
Staff Writer

Okay, let's be honest. Every single one of you who stopped to read this article has probably already heard complaint after complaint from everyone.

But honestly, WTF?

The game was moved back twice, and for what? Because people keep running into the building screaming, "Guys! Wouldn't this be a great idea for a character?" Are you serious? I'm sorry, but it was fairly obvious that that was what was happening when they announced Captain Olimar as a character (even though he looks like a fairly interesting character to play).

I mean, don't get me wrong, the prospect of pitting Sonic the Hedgehog against Snake makes me immensely happy. They've hyped the game up so much now that innocent gamers everywhere (including myself) are exploding with candy and excitement. It's gotten to the point where every time I play Melee, I'm asking where Meta Knight is. It's a tad frustrating, really.

It's mainly because I keep checking the website for updates. They're scraping the bottom of the barrel for things to announce and it shows. Yes, I understand that it originally was supposed to be out in December, but it's still quite disheartening to look at the site in hopes that they announce a new character, Final Smash, or something equally cool only to find out that the game has a sound test (the music is by Nobuo Uematsu, though, pretty awesome).

In all honesty, I'm not too angry about it. Annoyed? Slightly. Disgruntled? Definitely. I'm comparing it to waving a huge piece of steak in a dog's face, then putting it away and telling the dog that it'll get the steak tomorrow. Repeatedly. Even the dog will eventually get a bit exasperated.

No one can get to Rome

Eric John
Web Manager

I take pride in my school, in that our classes are hands-on, that my education will prove that I have learned much from here, and that many other capable people have left our school to go on to do great things.

But for the life of me, I cannot imagine any Civil Engineering student who would want to admit to being an SPSU student right now. And why, you might ask? The reason is simple: Roads.

Anyone who has driven to the SPSU campus lately has noticed the new construction taking place at the school. But more than that, any commuter student could point out that our main parking lot has had the front of it ripped open, and the small parking in front of the student center has also been removed.

More so than that, the only safe place to make a left-hand turn out of the school on to the 120 loop has also been blocked off.

Though the benefits are numerous, I find myself incapable of getting past one main issue with this plan. Why was it deemed a good idea to shut down commuter lots during normal semesters? Why did we make it harder for students to get to class and to come to this campus?

If SPSU is home to so many great engineering degrees, why did they decide that shutting down the most convenient entrance/exit to the school in the middle of the academic year was a good decision?

Shouldn't we be showing the rest of the community that SPSU makes not only sound structural decisions, but that our designs will not severely impact the rest of the business when we make them?

Our school is in the business of getting students here and educating them. So why are we making it more difficult for them to get here?

The only possible advantage that I can think of to this plan is that we are attempting to mimic our successful neighboring university, Kennesaw. Kennesaw State University always seems to have some construction project occurring on their campus that makes it as difficult as possible to get from one side of campus to the other, or even on to their campus. Yet they seem to be having record growth in all of their programs. Perhaps we are trying to apply the same tactic to our school, hoping that by inconveniencing all commuter students, they will feel challenged, and through the challenge of finding a parking space, they might excel and tell all of their friends to join them.

For the last four years I have heard nothing but complaints from KSU students about the terrible parking situation and how construction in the middle of a semester was making their lives miserable. And always, there was noticeable envy of our school's ability to grow without ruining the student's commute.

But as it looks right now, that's no longer a difference between our two schools.

Housing, simply unconscionable

Stuart Michelson
Copy Editor

In Volume 61, Issue 12 of The Sting, I wrote a piece entitled, "SPSU Residents are For Sale" in which I outlined the increasing problem that menu distribution and solicitation has become on campus. I promised a followup in that article, here it is.

I would like readers to refer back to that article at thesting.org to see my reasons why it is to me a safety concern, and remind readers that in that article I stated, "Housing made it clear that the UCUR (Unwanted Contributions to the Uglification of my Residence) distribution is in violation of a slough of rules and breaches the cleanliness standards they wish to establish here. I am not going to throw rocks at our Housing department in this article. I cannot say with surety that they were even aware of the situation, and it would be unfair to assume that they were. Only time will tell if they attempt to reign in the situation surrounding these individuals who come to campus to advertise. To Housing's credit, the sign is still posted (albeit abused, but pictured with this article) clearly stating, "No Soliciting" in the Commons parking lot."

Time has told, and as far as Housing dealing with the situation, I rate them F-. Nothing has been done to curb the steadily increasing amount of paper trash being strewn about my residence.

It has become clear to me that their concern for "community" cleanliness and rules that they relayed in their communication with me was just telling me what I wanted to hear so I'd go away as one less problem. That's simply unconscionable.

I know from other situations that have arisen with Housing, and from speaking with others, that they frequently refuse to speak to students face to face about their petitions. Rather they seem to prefer impersonal email as their medium. Only now do I realize that I was going about the menu issue all wrong by speaking to them face to face. I failed to afford them an opportunity to write an impersonal note.

Therefore this short piece is an invitation for Housing to write a statement for The Sting as to state of their solicitation enforcement efforts for all to see. (And no, the "Housing Herald" does not count.)

The Middle: Prime Time?

Christiaan Funkhouser
Senior Staff Writer

Happy New Year!! As I sit down listening to my newly bought Goofy Movie Soundtrack. Because of the beauty of Capitalism, I bought this CD overseas instead of in the good 'ol U.S. America. U.S. Average price? $45 I bought it over in the UK for 8 pounds. Which translates to about $18 in dollars (including shipping and handling). Why is this? Because of Capitalism. There is such a demand for it in the United States that the price has gone up to over twice the cost elsewhere.

Why is capitalism awesome, and why am I telling you all this? Because, when selecting a president, it is imperative that we elect someone who knows that. Specifically speaking, the Republican candidate has to be a Reagan conservative. A conservative who understands this country's greatest asset is American exceptionalism and the people within it. It's the idea that Americans left to themselves can and will accomplish incredible things. He has to know, value and understand the fact that Americans without a strong federal government can achieve so much more than Americans who are dependent on the government for healthcare <coughs> Huckabee's non support of the President's veto of S-CHIP <coughs>

I have a number of things I'm looking for in a President. This understanding is crucial to being an awesome president. This is why I'm supporting Former Massachusetts Governor Mitt Romney, time after time, Mitt has proven himself, through his governorship NOT empty words that he is a conservative. Unlike Mike Huckabee, and John McCain who claim to be conservative Republicans but instead are Republicans who try to be water downed liberals, and populists.

Mike Huckabee raised taxes more times in 10 years as governor of Arkansas than Bill Clinton did in 12. John McCain has his name on the biggest restriction of free speech ever to pass the houses of congress. When looking at candidates, we cannot simply pick a candidate based on image. Mike Huckabee is running as a Christian, who is pro-life, pro-gun, and pro-low-taxes. Ok. Being pro-life and supporting the second amendment means you're a Republican, and the pro-low-taxes is a lie (based not on words but on past governing.) I'm not going to vote for someone simply because he's a Christian.

"But Christiaan" you guys may be thinking, "Romney is a Mormon! The Mormon church is going to dictate everything he does," as well as, "Romney is a flip flopper." I'm going to answer these two points.

Romney's being a part of the Mormon church doesn't mean he'll be taking orders from the church. These fears were the exact same when John F. Kennedy was running for president. There were fears that the Pope would have a secret tunnel to the White House so that he could directly run the state. Mormon Doctrine teaches that Jesus is the son of God and that he died for our sins. While I don't totally agree with their teachings, and I do have problems with some of their core doctrines I do not have a problem with having a Mormon president.

Also, I allow for a change of views once. Someone who believed a lie can come to see the truth and I cannot hold that against them. What's better, someone who claims to believe something but his actions do not line up behind it, or someone who used to believe a lie and has come to see the truth? Someone who sees the truth is not anything to scorn at.

So, let's go past identity politics and look at actual issues.

A Conservative does NOT believe in raising taxes. The best way to balance the budget is to cut down on government. If the government needs money downsize until it's making enough. (These facts are from Mitt's website <http://www.mittromney.com>. I'm summing them up and rewording the important facts with my own commentary.)

Romney was governor of the MOST liberal state in the United States. By the end of his term in office he had balanced a $3 billion dollar deficit by cutting down the size of government, wasteful spending, and putting forth economic reforms reversing the backward liberal policies. Many of his opponents will state that Romney raised fees, and they call these fees taxes. Check this idea... if you use the government, you have to pay a fee to use it. Oh em gee. I can't believe these radical ideas.

A Conservative believes that the best way to create jobs and prevent recessions is to leave it up to the individuals. Create incentives that individuals have to take up, and let the private sector do its thing. He left office with a low unemployment after adding 60,000 jobs.

Creating incentives for people to do well in school including a hope scholarship type approach to grades giving a free college education to those in the top 25 percentile Governor Romney made things competitive. He also supported English immersion for those who don't speak English instead of giving them incentives to stay English illiterate by forcing teachers to cater to Spanish speaking students and not learning English.

One of the things that most surprises me was his solution to the health care problem. He signed into law a law that supported a market based PRIVATE healthcare. Instead of giving an incompetent government power over yours and my healthcare, he helped the healthcare providers to better provide healthcare to their clients. He didn't use the government as the answer to the question; he used the government to broker a deal, (more of what the Government was designed for.)

After leaving office he took control of the Salt Lake City games and got rid of a $379 deficit due to corruption, and mis-management, including organizing volunteers, and getting up a top notch security set up after 9/11.

Lastly, one of the most important things in my opinion is that the President must have some sort of leadership role, not as a senator or a congressman, but as a governor and even more important in a leader of a company in the Private sector. The Government arena is to plush, whereas the private sector is cut-throat.

From 1978 until 1984 the then Mr. Romney was the vice president of Bain and Company and after that he started his own investment company then was asked to return to Bain and Company in order to lead, "a financial restructuring of the organization." If a company is asking a person to lead a restructuring of itself, that means they're looking for someone honest, with good business sense, and that it going to raise profits while maintaining good relations with friends.

When looking at the presidential candidates, look at issues. How has the candidate governed or voted. Match these things up to what they're saying, and when it doubt look at who the liberal media is promoting and who they're trying to destroy. Right now, they love McCain and Huckabee, and rarely talk about Romney and Thompson in a positive light. This election is going to be one over ideas and identities. Which one are you going to vote for?

Conservatism is at the precipice. If McCain or Huckabee win, we will have lost to liberal Republicans. Instead of electing people who are like Ronald Reagan, one of the best presidents in the history of the United States we're going to have a new crop of republican candidates who try to be cheap imitations of liberals, and play the lesser of two evils card to get elected while trying to cater to the independents.

Leading up to the election, I'm going to write periodically on the core principles of conservatism, including economics, government responsibility, education, and yes, even global warming. I'll be writing a manifesto of sorts based on Reagan Conservatism - economic libertarianism and social conservatism.

Ronald Reagan once said, speaking to a number of Conservatives: "Fellow citizens, fellow conservatives, our time is now. Our moment has arrived. We stand together shoulder to shoulder in the thickest of the fight. If we carry the day and turn the tide we can hope that as long as men speak of freedom and those who have protected it, they will remember us, and they will say, 'Here were the brave and here their place of honor.'"

Huckaboom coming to Georgia

Stuart Michelson
Copy Editor

With a narrowing field in the GOP primary race, those who understand the importance of delegates see that it has become a Huckabee, Romney, and McCain race. I would contend however that it is a Huckabee and Romney race as no true Conservative can identify with McCain's Liberal positions, which are an affront to the majority. These are the two candidates that Conservatives identify with. Although I am a Romney fan (but Huckabee supporter), I believe he has employed some dirty campaign tactics, including spending over $585,000 (according to the Federal Election Commission) on smear ads about Huckabee's tax record. Huckabee has recently come under attack as not being a fiscal conservative, and in extreme cases, equated with Liberals and called a populist.

I'll defend Huckabee's tax record (which speaks for itself) and answer the populist charges later, but now I want readers to meet Mike Huckabee and learn what he is all about. Below are just some of his distinctively Conservative positions:

1- Mike Huckabee is serious about border security. Huckabee is the only candidate that can boast the endorsement of the founder of the MinuteMen. The "Secure America" plan includes building the fence (that America has already paid for), increasing the size of border patrol enforcement, preventing amnesty with tactics that bar illegal criminals from re-entering in the future for a decade, enforcing strict illegal immigrant laws on employers who provide a safe haven for these law breakers, pushing for the FairTax which removes legal immigrants' incentive to come to America, empowering the local authorities to enforce immigration law, discouraging dual citizenship, and abolishing the visa lottery system. Huckabee has signed the "No Amnesty Pledge" which stands in sharp contrast to amnesty lovers like McCain. Huckabee understands that securing our borders is a national security priority to prevent major terror attacks on our soil.

2 - Mike Huckabee will defend religious freedom for all in America through the First Amendment. Huckabee (a former Baptist minister) believes that America was founded in a spirit of faith. He will not use that as an empowering provision to tell others what they have to believe, but will not separate his faith from his professional life.

3 - Mike Huckabee supports the passage of a Constitutional amendment to protect the unborn. He wants to see Roe vs. Wade overturned. As the governor of Arkansas, Huckabee passed legislation to defend the unborn, and no candidate can boast such a pro-life record (especially Romney.) He opposes embryonic stem cell research, and recognizes the need to end the mindless slaughter of our unborn by the thousands every day. Huckabee has the endorsement of the Georgia Right to Life. A Life Amendment has been a part of the GOP platform since 1980; have the rest of the candidates forgot? Or do they not hear the cries of the unborn?

4 - Mike Huckabee wants to fix education. In Arkansas as governor, Huckabee created one of the most demanding high school curricula in the entire country. He fought the teacher's unions and won the right to fire the teachers that were not doing their jobs. He fostered a system where teachers were accountable to the parents and has had significant national experience with education reform. He will protect the states' rights to carry out their own education programs for their students and keep the federal government from abolish the IRS and eliminate all federal income and payroll taxes. The internal revenue code would be replaced by a consumption tax, and consist of a monthly reimbursement so that we are not taxed on necessities. Huckabee sees how the current progressive tax system penalizes success and hard work, and will allow the FairTax system to encourage and reward hard work and success. Huckabee will promote free and fair trade and tell the Liberals that America's deficit is not because the people are under-taxed, it is because the government overspends. Huckabee will make the Bush tax-cuts permanent.

7- Mike Huckabee supports the passage of a Constitutional Amendment to define marriage as between one man and one woman. He opposes any attempts to weaken the American family, which is the source of our strength. Huckabee defended marriage in Arkansas, and will do so for America because cans anywhere and anytime they can. He acknowledges that we are in a global struggle against Islamic terrorism and we must stand up to Iran and support Israel. When we attack our enemies, we will do so with overwhelming force.

Those are just nine of the many issues facing America in this election, which I believe is the most important in American history. Mike Huckabee as you can see holds strong Conservative positions on issues McCain (Amnesty, abortion, free speech, Bush tax-cuts) and even Romney (abortion, the surge in Iraq) have not stood strong, or waffled on. Yet Huckabee finds himself smeared as a populist, a panderer and a moderate.

So to answer those two charges levied against him - I'll start with taxes.

It takes more than the defense of the 2nd Amendment to call yourself a Conservative (although Huckabee has the best record of all alty, and so on and so on. I'm not listing every instance because they all cannot fit in the article. Look at the tax record in context and not just what the pundits say, and you'll find Huckabee's tax record tells a Conservative story. He left the Arkansas tax burden below the national average. The only states with heavier tax burdens are Maine, New York, Ohio, Minnesota, Hawaii, Nebraska, Wisconsin, Rhode Island, Connecticut, Vermont, Louisiana, Indiana, Illinois, California, Washington, Michigan, New Jersey, Kentucky, Kansas, Maryland, West Virginia, North Carolina, Utah, Iowa, Georgia, Pennsylvania, and the District of Columbia. Get the point? This record speaks for itself.

Mike Huckabee is fiscally responsible and Conservative. He was outspent 15 to 1 in Iowa by Romney and won the Iowa Caucus. He has been working with limited funds the entire campaign and has shown great wisdom in how to use them. Does this sound like someone will do anything but curb irresponsible spending in Washington?

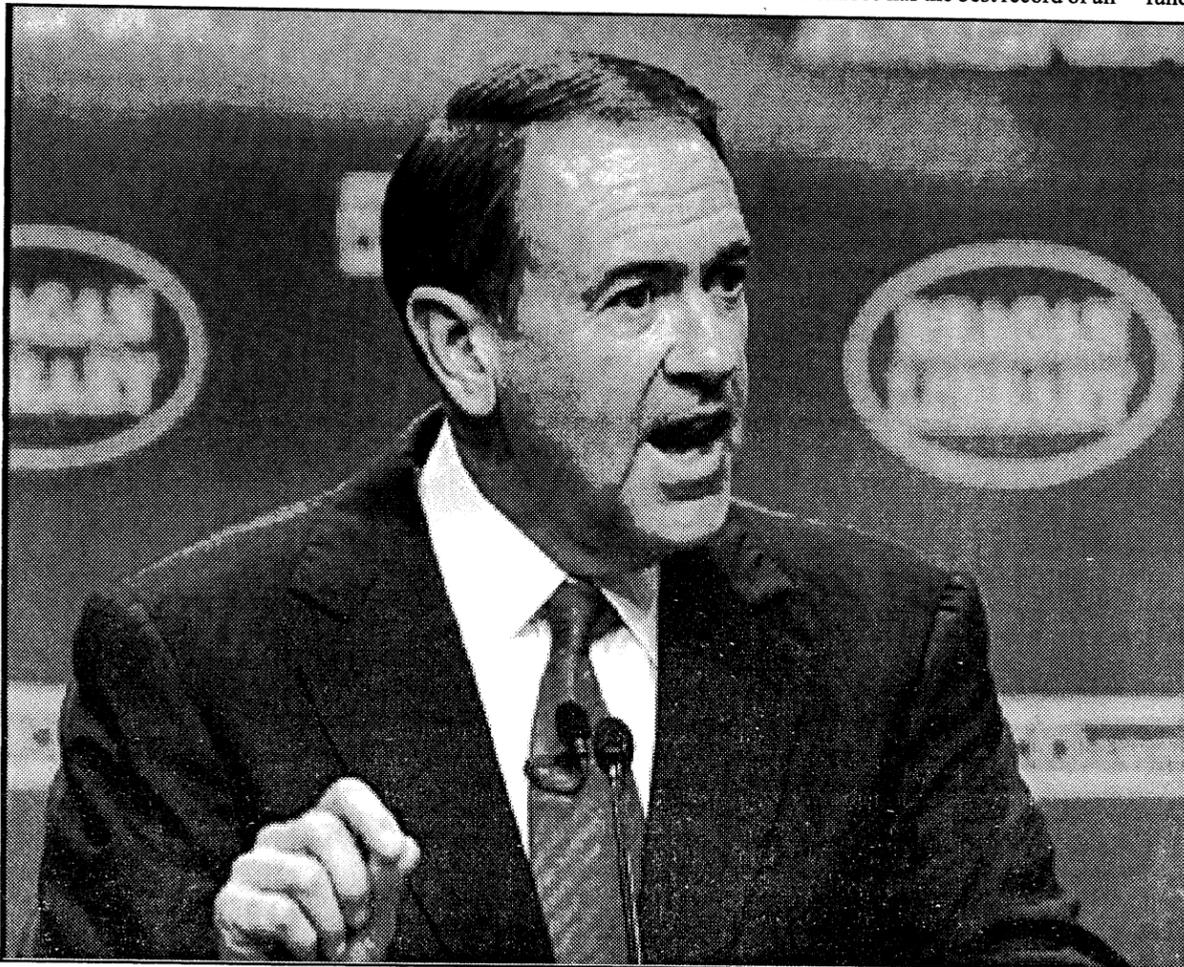

As for the populist charges, I won't spend much space on it. It is total nonsense. His position speaks for itself once more. I encourage anyone who dares to call Huckabee a populist to look up and listen to/watch his speech entitled "Pastors and Pews" and not recant the charge. He isn't a panderer, or practicing identity politics, which is clear enough in most of what he says and that speech in particular.

So as the Huckaboom spreads across the country, how do things look here in Georgia? With Georgia's primary taking place on February 5th, I am pleased to announce that Huckabee is leading our state with 34%, McCain with 19% and Romney with 16%. He is favored by 70% of likely GOP primary voters. (Rasmussen Data 1/22.) Huckabee can boast strong numbers nationally as well as he leads several national polls.

Despite the bitter contest, and tension between some candidates in the GOP, the party must rest assured that no matter who wins our nomination (Romney or Huckabee in my opinion), we must see the defeat of the Democratic Party this year. Their 3 top candidates have no ideological differences, and all will see that we surrender in Iraq, destroy our healthcare with Socialism, raise our taxes, and look to the government to solve our every problem.

I'll make one more prediction: The Democrats appear slated in my opinion to do what they do best—lose elections. Just look at the history books.

Voting is important, get educated and do it. (But Chuck Norris especially wants you to vote for Mike Huckabee) he has the most solid pro-family record of any candidate.

8 - Mike Huckabee is the energy independence candidate. He will ensure energy independence by the end of a second term. Doing so will guarantee safety in an age of terrorism and foster prosperity in an age of globalization. Energy independence has been on America's 'to-do list' for too long. Let's stop handing out money to terrorists simply by filling up our cars.

9 - Mike Huckabee supports victory in Iraq. We will not falter, fail or retreat under Mike Huckabee. He has always supported the surge and the war in Iraq and will not call troops home until they can do so victoriously and with honor. Huckabee is against all talk of a timetable for retreat as Liberals suggest. He understands the ideology of the Islamic murderers, and sees the bigger picture of their intentions to kill all and any Amerioverriding them.

5 - Mike Huckabee understands that healthcare in America (although the best in the world) is broken. He attributes this primarily to the fact that we have a "health care" system, not a "health" system. Huckabee stands firm against the folly of universal or socialized medicine, and rather supports moving from an employer based to a consumer based health system. Huckabee recognizes that jobs do not need health care, people do. Having lost a significant amount of weight himself, and written the book about living a healthy life, Huckabee personally understands the importance of being healthy and providing Americans with more health care options, not less (or one -the government, as Democrats would have it.)

6 - Mike Huckabee is the FairTax (learn more www.fairtax.org) candidate. He wants to the candidates in defense of gun owner's rights), but real dedication to lowering and not raising taxes. This is a Reagan principle. In over 160 years, the people of Arkansas had never seen a broad based tax cut. Then they met Mike Huckabee, who proudly was the first to cut their taxes 94 times which resulted in 100,000 new jobs that revitalized a weak post-Clinton economy.

Huckabee balanced the budget every year he was governor (10 and half years) and left a surplus of almost a billion dollars when he inherited a Clinton deficit of multiple millions.

To say Mike Huckabee will raise taxes is to admit you have not done your homework. He pushed an $80 million dollar tax cut package through a Democratic Congress, cut Arkansas' capital gains tax by 25%, eliminated income tax for families below the poverty line, eliminated the marriage pen-

To be frank, I'm looking for a weiner

Adam Myers
Staff Writer

I'm a man who tries to keep a visage of discriminating tastes. I turn my nose at a McDonald's hamburger; I hold frozen Tombstone pizzas in the utmost contempt, and view Domino's Pizza with only marginally higher opinion; and I take pride in having eaten just a single cup of ramen in my entire life. But dammit, there are few things I enjoy better than a good hot dog.

And why shouldn't I? After all, this unassuming combination of an unassuming sausage placed inside an unassuming bun has proven itself an incredibly adaptable, versatile, and affordable part of everyday cuisine for over a century. Wherever this sandwich has manifested itself, enterprising vendors and restaurateurs have found a way to put their own spin on the dish. It's been boiled, steamed, fried, grilled, smoked, nuked, and even served cold, then topped with an endless array of accompaniments.

Hot dogs often have the ability to send one who eats them to faraway places where its particular preparation is unheard of, such is the widespread history of the food. For example, despite the lore of the New York boardwalk, the Coney Island dog topped with chili and onions was invented over 600 miles away in Detroit; perhaps in response, greasy spoons in upstate New York refer to them more correctly as Michigan hot dogs. Even in the Teutonic world, the center of the sausage universe, countries pass the buck on exactly where the hot dog comes from: Germans and Swiss call it a wiener (after the Austrian capital of Vienna), while Austrians refer to it as a frankfurter (after the German city of Frankfurt). To make matters worse, American meatpackers typically bestow the name wiener to pork-based hot dogs and frank to beef-based hot dogs, even though traditional classification in Europe is the reverse! (Considering the fact that the wonderful people of Frankfurt and Vienna can't decide which one of them didn't come first, though, perhaps we Yanks have had the right idea all along.)

For all the intriguing regional variations and volleying geographical etymologies that the hot dog has to offer, though it pains me to see how such a venerable part of Namethecountry-ana much like the image of GIs raising the flag in a Chevrolet commercial, is routinely exploited while pandering to the lowest common denominator. Thanks to the need for ESPN to fill gaps in its programming schedule with anything that could be considered athletic competition, the first thing that comes to many minds at the mention of hot dogs is the grotesque image of Japanese gurgitators with elastic stomachs force-feeding themselves for a mustard-yellow belt. Meanwhile, the top sellers of hot dogs are convenience stores, whose pallid sausages endlessly turning on a fat-coated grill are far from my definition of good eats, even if they sell for 99 cents a pop.

No! When I want a hot dog, I make sure to seek it at a place where the food is given the respect it deserves, where the combination of toppings is only limited to my imagination and the quantity of condiments available. There are many such restaurants devoted to selling a top-quality dog at a fair price in the vicinity of the SPSU campus, and this article looks into detail at three of them, each giving its own interpretation of the iconic sandwich.

To begin, I head to the place whose name is synonymous with the chili dog in Atlanta: The Varsity (2790 Town Center Drive,

I understand why people have been coming here since the 1920s (not literally here, since the Kennesaw Varsity only opened in 1999, but I count the chain as a collective property). The made-on-location chili is tangy and not overwhelmingly spicy, making a perfect addition to the dog. The only shame is that the thing isn't bigger, as I finish it off in no time. At $1.78 apiece, though, the Varsity's prices are cheap enough that ordering another chili dog is no worry at all. Better yet, it means that even those with the tightest budget contains seven – count 'em, seven – condiments: mustard, sweet relish, chopped onions, tomato wedges, a dill pickle spear, sport peppers, and a dash of celery salt (preferably in that order). Due to the vast array of vegetables represented, albeit mostly in pickled form, a Chicago-style hot dog is commonly referred to as being “dragged through the garden.” Ketchup, chili, or any other tomato-based sauce does not belong anywhere near a Chicago dog: a violation of this rule is viewed by many Windy City natives as a

are sparsely decorated with Bears and Cubs memorabilia; the menu is displayed on a cork bulletin board; the register has no credit card reader; behind the counter, gyro meat spins slowly on an electric rotisserie. For anyone not taken aback by the lack of modern amenities (and with the good sense to carry cash), $2.25 buys a Chicago dog in all its seedy, snappy, savory glory. Honorable mention goes to the Maxwell Street Polish, a kielbasa topped with grilled onions and mustard that holds a similar cult status as its better-dressed cousin: a Maxwell Street Polish can be ordered for $3.45.

Returning to another hot dog stand with local roots, the third and final entrant in this battle of eats is Barkers Red Hots (3000 Windy Hill Road SE, Suite B-6), which in 1984 was the first licensed street vendor to be licensed by the city of Atlanta. After selling the business in the mid-90s and seeing the eventual decline in product quality, the original owners recently bought back the rights to the Barkers Red Hots name and have opened a new stand-alone location at a retail center catering to the lunch crowd from the many office buildings in the Vinings-Cumberland area. Despite its roots in yellow pushcarts around downtown Atlanta, the interior at Barkers has a boardwalk motif, with hues of blue and sea green dominating the eyes and an ambient soundtrack of crashing waves playing in the background.

The major selling card at Barkers is that unlike other quick-serve restaurants, where hot dogs are typically steamed or boiled, Barkers sausages are broiled over a charcoal grill. As a result, the hot dog develops a crispy skin and a smoky flavor. A typical red hot comes topped with mustard, onion, and Barkers “famous” hot sauce, actually more of a spicy-sweet chili sauce which counters well with the flavors of the hot dog. A basic red hot costs $2.59 – a higher price than the previous vendors reviewed, but a regular hot dog here is noticeably larger than at either restaurant. Barkers also offers a steamed hot dog for $1.79 as well as vegetarian dogs (the only location out of the three reviewed to have such an option) and grilled Italian and Polish sausages at an additional cost.

Can I pick any one of these restaurants' hot dogs as superior to the others? Absolutely not, because each one has its own endearing qualities. Judging by the quality of the sausage itself, the char-grilled dog at Barkers is without a doubt the best. However, the variety of flavors and textures provided by the dog at Chicago Delights is more than enough to give it a try. As for the chili dog at the Varsity, my feelings toward it can be best described by alluding to the old Schaefer beer slogan: “The Varsity is the hot dog to have when eating more than one.”

With that note, I conclude this article. As I do at the end of every article, I tip my glass to you, wishing for you to eat well, drink well, and live well...I've reached my dog quota for this piece, so I leave this space reserved for clichéd salutations vacant.

The Varsity might be an Atlanta landmark, but can its chili dog stand up against one dragged through the garden?

Kennesaw; additional locations in Alpharetta, Norcross, Buckhead, and Midtown Atlanta). The original location near the Georgia Tech campus has been a local institution for 80 years, and the Varsity has responded to its enduring popularity by opening three new restaurants in the suburbs over the last decade. The Kennesaw location neighboring Town Center mall is easily spotted by the distinctive Streamline Moderne design shared by the restaurants of the chain. While the Varsity's menu includes burgers, chicken, and various other sandwiches, it is most famous for its chili dog.

The first thing that I notice about the chili dog upon ordering it is how average it appears. For a place whose menu is the stuff of local legend, a dog at the Varsity has the look of an ordinary hot dog in an ordinary bun, topped with chili and mustard. When I eat it, though, can indulge on a Frosted Orange, the most tempting frozen beverage known to man.

Meanwhile, as much of an institution the Varsity chili dog may be in Atlanta, its legacy and grandeur shrivels in comparison to the pride Chicagoans take in their local cuisine. Food and lifestyle experts have long considered the Windy City the greatest culinary destination in America, and while Chicago's upscale dining scene is world-class, its biggest strength lies in its unique proletarian fare. After all, only in a diverse working-class hub could vendors turn a flatbread into a casserole, a meatloaf into an ancient Greek specialty, a roast beef sandwich into the world's most delicious meat sponge, and a hot dog into a salad on a bun.

Whereas hot dogs in most parts of the world may add a topping or two, a Chicago-style hot dog cardinal sin. In addition to all these toppings, an authentic Chicago dog must be assembled on a poppy-seed bun; the sausage itself must be from Vienna Beef, whose natural-casing hot dogs make a distinctive snap when bitten into.

Considering all of these particulars, it's no small wonder that metro Atlanta is home to a number of Chicago-style eateries catering to transplanted residents. (Having spent the first sixteen years of my life in downstate Illinois, I remain astounded by the fact that it is easier to find such establishments here than if one took an hour's drive from Wrigley Field.) Among these, the nearest to campus is Chicago Delights (10 Chert Road), located just to the east of the Big Chicken as Roswell Street crosses under I-75. From all appearances, this is a no-frills place. The interior seating is 1970s fast-food chic; the walls

Rockband Is $169.99 cheap enough?

Sean Fine
Senior Staff Writer

Genre: Musical Rhythm

Platforms: PS2, PS3, Xbox 360

When Rockband was first announced earlier this year, the idea seemed genius. Take what Guitar Hero, Karaoke Revolution, and other rhythm games proved was a fun idea and mesh them together into one big rocking package. A good idea on paper, but how does the final production come out?

Story: The game does have some sense of a story, though in very small calibers. You make a rock band from scratch, making each of the members of your band, including their face, hair styles, and eventually clothing once you get the cash. You start off with a gig in a city and from there you gain fans and get more gigs to try out, thus allowing you to get more fans, until you eventually reach some of the biggest stages in the world. The road is long and hard, but with your Rockband, you'll come out on top.

Gameplay: If you've played Guitar Hero, you pretty much know what to expect when it comes to playing the guitar or bass; just hold the corresponding button and flick the flipper to strum a note. If you've endured the torture of Guitar Hero 3's insane hammer-ons and suicidal 3 minute solos, then you'll notice handling the guitar in Rockband is significantly easier, making the game much more fun than it is painful. While you can't perform hammer-ons except when doing a solo, you'll quickly get the hang of playing the guitar on easy.

The two major additions in this title are the microphone and the drums, both of which bring their own degree of challenge. First off, the microphone section of the game the right pad at the right time, but preventing your leg from hitting the foot pedal when you're not supposed to. It's a very challenging experience, but just like the microphone and guitar, with enough practice, you can get better at the drums.

In world tour mode, though, you encounter one significant problem, you'll be playing the same songs over and over and over again. Not to mention that there are some feats that can seem impossible as because the graphics players will be paying attention to run as smooth as they should in a rhythm game.

Overall, I think the graphics are nice, and while they may not be as smooth as Guitar Hero 3, I almost think they add a sense of realism. (Plus the customization is pretty cool for a rock game.)

Sound: The game boasts a good selection of songs as well as a selection of mediocre songs, depending on your taste, but there's no doubt that you and your friends will find a song they'll all enjoy. Personally, our group loves us some Coheed and Cambria.

The main treat from Rockband is that with online services (Xbox Live for instance) will offer new song packages for players to play. In fact, there's a Metallica package for purchase right now and there's only going to be more as time progresses. Most of the songs are from original artists, so why not enjoy more?

Overall: So the moment of truth approaches... is $169.99 a worthy investment, especially for college students who probably has no money anyway? The game is meant to be played with multiple people. If you have reliable friends who all want to play, why not make a investment of it and have them all chip in a little; none of you should regret it.

With tons of fun already packaged in and more to come, I give Rockband a 9/10 with a point lost only due to the constant selection of songs in World Tour mode.

Four player rocks outs galor!!!

almost requires players to know the songs they'll be singing, inside and out to succeed at most of the songs. While it is possible to cheat your way through songs, it's much more fun to just sing a song you know, but in order to unlock everything, you need to (like a real singer), practice-practice-practice.

The drum addition is no different. Unless you've played on a drumset before, playing the drums will be an experience on its own. The real challenge is not only hitting

One note must be made that with all these new instruments, there is bound to be broken controllers and foot pedals as you play too hard. Be good to your stuff or you might be paying more than you want to.

While there is solo-play for people to practice or even play through the world tour by themselves, the game's glory truly shines when you get a group of people together to play each instrument. At its core, Rockband is a party game and you'll have some each time you fail, you lose fans and the only way to earn fans is to complete songs of difficultly levels you haven't beaten before. It's a long and somewhat tedious road to fame.

Graphics: Graphically, the game presents the option to customize your singer's hairstyle and clothing, and there are plenty of options to please the numerous fans of the many rock genres presented. While the actual performance graphics are a bit shaky at first, I got over them

Shin Megami Tensei: Persona 3

Jasmine King
Staff Writer

Where have all the RPGs gone? Final Fantasy 13 (in all of its installments) isn't due out for a good while, and the possibility of a second Skies of Arcadia has me bouncing off the walls, but guess what? It's only a possibility, and therefore not out. If I play another second of Valkyrie Profile (great game, by the way, my attention span is just tiny and it starts slow... but that's another review for another day), I may go insane. So what's a girl to do in this world of really bad FPSs and cute little internet puzzle games?

Enter the Shin Megami Tensei series, a vast collection of great gameplay, dark storylines, and creative battle systems. My first foray into the Megaten world was a few years ago when I first heard about SMT: Nocturne. I read about the game and finally played it sometime later, and I was hooked. Then I heard about a new installment: Persona 3. I'd never played Persona 1 or 2, but when I saw his game, I was interested. However, soon came to a sinking realization that there was no way this game was coming to North America.

Fast forward to my birthday, last year. I walk into my local Jamestop to spend some birthday money, and lo and behold, behind the counter, was a brand new copy of Persona 3, complete with artbook and soundtrack.

I bought it. Anyway, enough backstory.

Persona 3 is a very stylish RPG. If the Final Fantasy series is the McDonald's of the video game world (they're everywhere, there's tons of them, and they make loads of money), then P3 would be the swanky downtown cafe frequented by broody twenty-somethings who wear berets and listen to Bjork. And hippies. The story behind P3 is a complex one.

You are the nameless main character (who actually has a name), a transfer student to Gekkoukan High School. It sounds ordinary enough, but from the second the game starts, it's clear that the situation is anything but. You are immediately drafted into SEES, a group of students masquerading as a school club that fight Shadows (obligatory baddies) in a place called Tartarus (better known as your school) during the Dark Hour (the hour that passes for a select few people between 12 and 12:01 am.)

Confused yet? Good.

So how is a group of students supposed to fight the things that go bump in the night? Easy, by summoning spirits called Personas.

How does that happen? With the power of suicide!

...Okay, let me explain. The characters carry around tools called Evokers (which are shaped like pistols for some unexplained reason) which they hold to their heads and shoot whenever they need to call upon the power of Persona. This is why I initially thought that this game would never make it over here. Lucky for us, someone over at Atlus overcame their fear of offending or scaring the general public.

So anyway, your friends, who fight with you, only use one Persona each. You, however, are the super special awesome main character. One Persona is hardly enough for you! You want them all! Fortunately, you actually get to use all of the Personas the game has to offer. And this game offers a LOT.

You can find them through cards in Tartarus, the 266 floor randomly-generated dungeon that appears every night during the Dark Hour, or through fusing others. Thankfully, you can register all of your Personas in the Persona Compendium, where for a fee you can re-summon your favorites for battle or fusion throughout the game.

Speaking of nights, the passing of time in this game is a lot of fun. Each day is split up into parts, most of which you'll spend at school (just like in real life, doing well on your exams comes before saving the world.) You also get time to study and hang out with friends, and if you choose to go to Tartarus that night or if a story-related event comes up, then you enter the Dark Hour, which is when you'll do the majority of the fighting in the game.

The feature I enjoyed most of all is the Social Link system. Every Persona has an alignment, as does every person you befriend in the game. The closer you get to a certain person, the more extra experience you can earn to make all of the Personas in that alignment even more powerful through fusion.

For example, one of the first people you meet at school is of the Magician alignment. Spending time with him will give you more and more experience until finally, you max out the Social Link and earn the ultimate Persona of that alignment. Some of them are story-driven and level up automatically, while some are only accessible once you get your Charm, Academics, or Courage up to a certain level.

However, the opposite is also true. The ignoring or mistreating of a friend may cause them to become annoyed with you and send the Social Link into a reversed state, which means that you won't be able to gain any more experience until you reconcile. This becomes especially hard with the girls once you get them to the higher levels. You get into romantic relationships with them and you have to watch what you say to avoid getting them angry. Like real life, some of them are crazy and you may have to say something odd (like the opposite of what most people would typically want to hear... looking at you, Yukari) to get them to be the LEAST annoyed with you. Ugh, let's just say that I now understand what you guys have to go through, and on behalf of women everywhere, I apologize.

Persona 3: great game. I really love the whole RPG-meets-Japanese-dating-sim thing, and the story is great. Megaten games are traditionally hard to find after their initial release, so grab this one when you can.

TKE's Run for Breath for cystic fibrosis

Keaton Wheeler
Tau Kappa Epsilon Histor

Once a year, the members of the Tau Kappa Epsilon Fraternity (TKE) at Southern Polytechnic State University (SPSU) get together for a charity event called Run for Breath.

We host this event to raise money for the research and treatment of cystic fibrosis.

Cystic fibrosis is a gene deficit disease that limits motor skills and nervous functions by attacking the respiratory system of the human body.

In 1980 our brother, Tommy Crummley, succumbed to cystic fibrosis at the age of 19. Every year since then we have hosted a Run for Breath in his memory.

Traditionally we ran 72 miles to North Georgia Military College from SPSU. We carried the game ball, and delivered it to the basketball team before they played North Georgia later that day.

Today we run a roughly 5k lap around the campus, and ring the giant TKE bell after every person finishes.

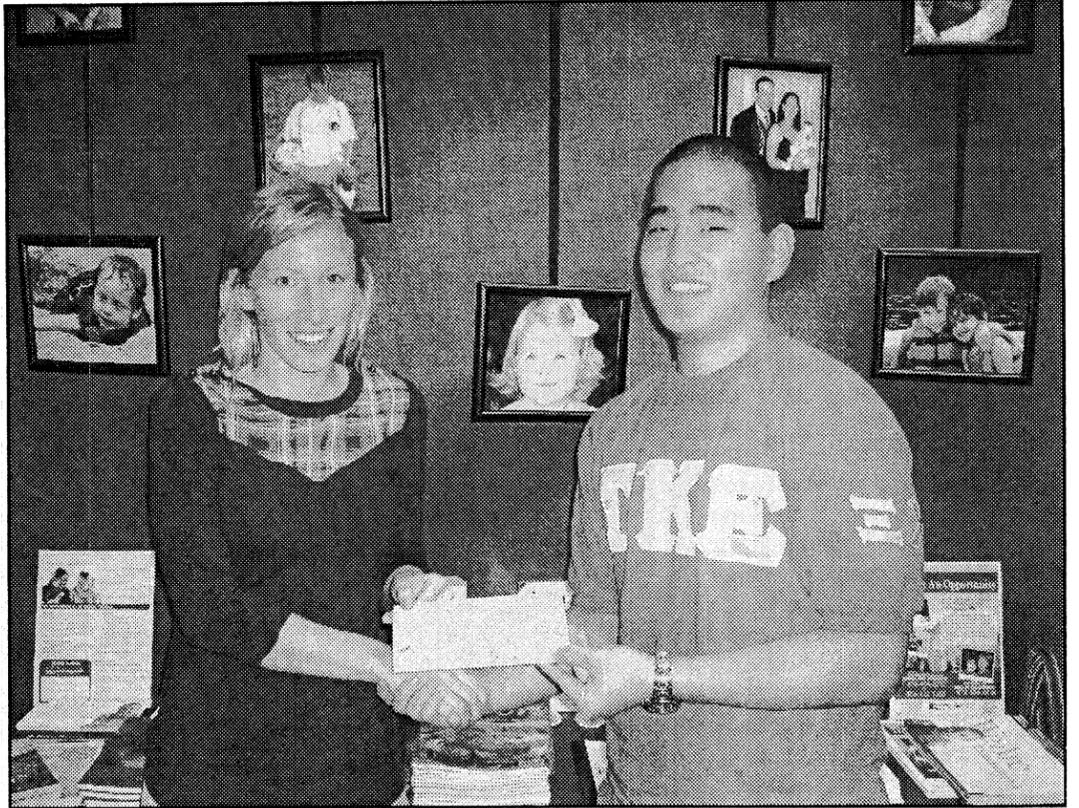

Leading up to and at the run, we take donations for the research and treatment of cystic fibrosis. We raised $1000 last year to be donated in memory of Tommy Crummley.

This year the Run for Breath will take place on the morning of February 9th between the Architecture building and the basketball gym.

We would love to see everyone out there running with us raising money to help us cure this terrible disease.

To make a donation please contact Charlie Song at csong@spsu.edu.

It would be most appreciated by those who are afflicted with cystic fibrosis, and their family and friends alike.
