A group of lesbians and gay men in DeKalb County join in a community effort to bring the holiday season to families who might not otherwise see one

by KC WILDMOON

Atlanta—Most Atlantans never see real life slices of the lives of lesbians and gay men, unless they happen to know them. Media reports present a slanted, limited view—protests, politics and the seamier side that makes for good sweeps week ratings.

For Laura Bevins of DeKalb County, that wasn't enough. She wanted a chance for lesbians and gay men to show that they weren't myopically concerned with only their own issues, and she found it through the Decatur Police Department.

"I thought it was time for us to something fun and positive in the larger community we belong to," Bevins said. "So I approached Judy Turner (a vice-president at BankSouth) and Shirley Kersey (a Decatur police officer). I mentioned to them that I'd like to do something, as a lesbian, to let people know that lesbians and gays are involved in the DeKalb community."

It "springboarded" from there, Bevins said, and she and several other groups and individuals from the lesbian/gay community joined forces with the Decatur Police Department's annual holiday project—to provide a holiday season for families that wouldn't have one otherwise.

The police department's community relations division annually "adopts" families, collecting money and getting volunteers to buy gifts and donate food to the families.

"I go to the school system, the social workers there," said Kersey, who is in her second year of coordinating the program. "They're the ones who know when a family needs something."

Kersey said the department also solicits donations from area businesses, such as restaurants and grocery stores, as well as collecting money for purchases. She was happy to have the help from the lesbian and gay community.

"I thought it would be great," she said, adding that she told some of the families that a gay group would be providing the gifts, and that the response was positive. "There was no problem," she said.

Bevins coordinated the effort to adopt five DeKalb families, and the response, she said, was terrific.

"They were so receptive," she said. "It was just regular people doing something for the community we live in"

The people who participated in the project agreed that it was a wonderful experience.

"It just feels good," said one woman, a 43-yearold therapist who wanted to remain anonymous. "I love buying toys. It gives me a chance to play."

The therapist adopted a family with six children, ranging in age from 5-months- to 9-years-old. Kersey provided the ages, a wish list and a list of clothes sizes for the kids, and left the rest to the volunteers.

"I'd find kids in the toy department and say 'how old are you?" the therapist said. "Then I'd say, 'what kind of skates would you want?""

"It was truly the most fun I've ever had at Toys 'R' Us," said Lisa Mount, another participant.

"It's the real meaning of Christmas," said Darlene Drury, who wrapped the gifts, "giving to somebody who's really going to appreciate it."

"We had a wonderful time doing it," said Dan Pruitt, who, along with his partner Mike Edwards, adopted a 4-year-old girl. "It's great imagining her opening the presents on Christmas morning."

"It was really nice to know that we could do something for kids who have fallen through the cracks as far as the system is concerned," said Edwards. "It was a lot of fun. And we found stuff for ourselves, too. We got some Nintendo games. Danny and I don't have any children to buy for, so it was really nice."

The experience left those who participated with a strong feeling of accomplishment—not just because they had helped out families in need.

"It's Christmas time. It's not charity time," said the therapist. "I wanted [the family] to have Christmas and not just be some woman who comes in and says 'see what I can do."

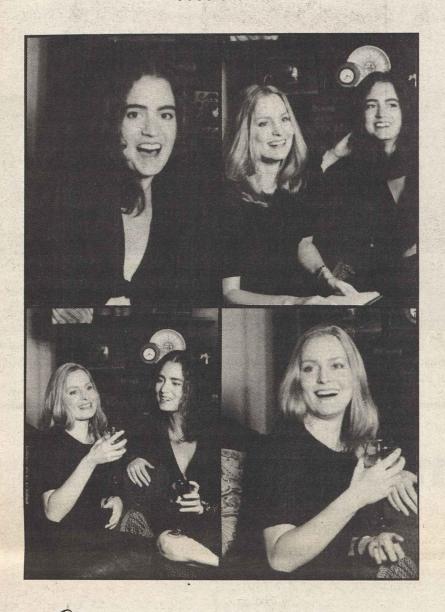

"Christmas is for kids," said Tim Boyd, a local businessman who was also involved in the project. "Of all the things I'm asked to do throughout the holiday season, this was something I thought I could give."

But the chance to do something through official channels as openly gay people was also a strong impetus.

"There's so many rotten things out there about us," the therapist said. "It was good to be doing some-CONTINUES ON PAGE 19 2

Atlanta bar gutted by fire

Atlanta—The Gallus Restaurant and Bar, one of Atlanta's oldest gay establishments, was gutted last week by a fire that officials believe was caused by a faulty furnace.

The early-morning blaze on Tuesday at the Gallus, located at the corner of Cypress and Sixth streets in Midtown, forced the closing of both the bar and restaurant. However, the fire did not delay the fourth annual Lighting of the Tree, an AIDS fundraiser sponsored by the Gallus that went off as planned in front of the establishment on Sunday evening.

Atlanta Fire Department officials said the fire was touched off by a defective furnace in the basement and spread through the walls of the building. The fire gutted the basement bar and caused some parts of the first floor to collapse.

"There was smoke coming out of every crack in the building when we pulled up," said

Chief Joe Talbot, who said the department received the call at about 8:15 a.m. and had the fire under control a little over an hour later. Firefighters stayed on the scene for about an hour and a half more to be certain all the fires were out.

"There were a lot of little fires [in the walls]," the chief said. "[The basement bar] is totalled. It's gone."

In addition to the damage in the basement and to the first floor, smoke damage throughout the building was extensive. There were no major injuries, but one firefighter was taken to a hospital to be checked for a minor injury.

According to a statement released by Quinton T. Hudson and Associates, attorneys for the bar management, the Gallus will be closed for an undetermined period of time while repairs are completed.

Police seek clues in murder of Raven Wolfdancer

Atlanta—A well-known figure in the gay men's spirituality movement was stabbed to death last week outside of his apartment in Poncey-Highland.

Atlanta police say they have no suspects in the murder of Raven Wolfdancer, 47, and they have not made a determination if his death was an anti-gay bias crime.

Wolfdancer's body was discovered by his landlady at about 7 a.m. on Dec. 13 outside of his apartment on Linwood Avenue. He had been stabbed in the chest. Sgt. J.J. James of the Atlanta Police's homicide division would not say if police believed Wolfdancer was killed by an intruder or someone he knew. But James said a neighbor "heard something" between 5 a.m. and 6 a.m. on the morning of Wolfdancer's death.

"We don't have any additional information at this time," James said. "We have no suspects identified. We are soliciting the public for any information they may have."

He was born in Indiana and lived from 1970 to 1976 near Big Stone Gap, Va., where he worked on conscientious objector issues and with a building co-op installing bathrooms for Appalachian families. After a year in Denver, Colo., he moved to Atlanta in 1977.

In 1984, he and Cathy Hope, now living in New Mexico, started The Gardeners, a land-scaping company, which he still operated at the time of his death. Wolfdancer was also an artist who worked for a time in the early 1980s with Chris Moses.

Lesbian couples at UGA fight for equal benefits

University officials say same-sex partners not entitled to discounts at student health care facility

Athens—Two lesbian students at the University of Georgia who want to include their partners in the university's student health plan have been turned down by the UGA administration.

Cohen said. "Having a same se integral part of being a lesbian."

UGA's Lesbian, Gay, Bis Union waged a letter-writing car port the change in policy, but the change in policy is the change in policy.

The battle for benefits began earlier this fall when Sharon Moore, a Ph.D. student and instructor in the English department, sought health care for her partner, Elaine Petrie, at the university's Gilbert Health Center.

Spouses of UGA students can receive health care at discounted rates, but that benefit apparently only applies to heterosexual couples who are legally married. Moore was told that she and Petrie did not qualify, even though the university has a policy banning discrimination based on sexual orientation.

"They told me that in order to be considered a spouse, I had to have either a marriage license or a tax form," Petrie said.

When the staff at the center refused Moore's opposed to Georgia law," he said.

request to include Petrie, the pair took their grievance to student affairs office. In the meantime, another student, Elise Cohen, and her partner, Leah Rushing, both from Atlanta, joined the fight. Rushing, too, was denied treatment at the health center.

"I don't see how it can be anything but discrimination based on sexual orientation," Cohen said. "Having a same sex partner is an integral part of being a lesbian."

UGA's Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual Student Union waged a letter-writing campaign to support the change in policy, but the nearly 100 letters the group generated were not enough to sway administration officials. Now, Moore, Petrie, Cohen and Rushing are considering their next moves—which could include legal action.

"The only way the university is going to do something is to get the faculty involved and maybe bring in somebody from outside to cause an uproar," says Moore. "We have 27,000 students on campus. Three hundred people upset aren't going to do much. But 3,000..."

Dwight Douglas, UGA's vice president for student affairs, told Southern Voice that "the policy is that we treat spouses and legal dependents."

"It's Georgia law. We can't do anything opposed to Georgia law" he said

A number of universities around the country, though none in Georgia, allow domestic partners of staff members and students to qualify for benefits granted to straight couples.

Douglas cited the difficulty in officially recognizing the partners of lesbians and gay men—and a concern for the economic status of Athens health care practitioners—as part of the basis for the decision.

"People can have whatever relationship they wish to have...but these are not easily documented relationships," he said. "If every single student at the University of Georgia said they had a spouse and stopped going to local physicians, we would sure hear it from the local community."

The only city in Georgia which allows same-sex couples to legally document their relationships by registering as domestic partners is Atlanta. Douglas referred to recent court challenges to Atlanta's domestic partnership ordinances as a deciding factor in the administration's decision not to include spouses of lesbian and gay students in the health plan.

"We're narrow in our application of that as a tax-supported, non-private, state agency," Douglas said.

Companies can't cover city partners

But the legal opinion striking down the city's domestic partnership ordinances won't affect private employees

by KC WILDMOON

Atlanta—Georgia Insurance Commissioner Tim Ryles has sent notices to two insurance companies informing them that they cannot provide insurance benefits to the domestic partners of Atlanta's city employees.

But Ryles' decision, prompted by Attorney General Michael Bowers' written opinion two weeks ago that the city's partnership ordinances were unconstitutional, will apparently not affect private companies that want to extend benefits to the same-sex couples.

Although Georgia law doesn't make Bowers' opinion legally binding on Ryles, the insurance commissioner's spokesperson, Kevin Curtin, confirmed that the insurance commissioner sent the companies notices on Dec. 13.

In an interview with Southern Voice, Bowers said that his opinion that cities and counties in Georgia cannot extend insurance coverage to domestic partners would not prevent a private company from doing so.

"In my view—and I don't have any comer on the market—it's strictly about government employment," Bowers said. "This has nothing to do with private employment."

The issue of whether the city's domestic partnership ordinances are legal is currently at the heart of a case in Fulton County Superior Court. Bowers admitted that it was unusual for an attorney general to issue an opinion on a matter already before the courts and said he had turned down a request from an unidentified state legislator who wanted a legal opinion on partnership. But because the insurance commis-

Neighbors want MCC church gone

Matthews, NC—A group of 25 homeowners who live near the New Life Metropolitan Community Church are asking a court to order the lesbian/gay-friendly church out of their suburban Charlotte neighborhood.

The neighbors argue that the zoning board in the town of Matthews erred in granting a variance that allowed the church to open. About half of the church's 50 members are gay or lesbian.

"Homosexuals are entitled to go wherever they want to go," said Charlotte lawyer Paul Whitfield, who represents the families. "But I don't want one in my neighborhood."

But the Rev. Robert Darst of New Life MCC said the church won't leave the 2.6-acre site—unless the residents are willing to pay for it.

"If they want to buy it from us, we'll sell it to them," said Darst, who is gay. "At a profit, of course. We'll make money off their homophobia."

Superior Court Judge Zoro Guice Jr. said Dec. 7 he'll decide whether local landowners have the right to drive out the church. The judge said the town of Matthews failed to notify surrounding owners about the zoning variance that allowed the church to locate there.

Residents fighting the church say they object to lesbians and gay men worshipping in their community.

"I think we have the right to choose what we want in our neighborhood. I have small children. I don't want them exposed to it," said Lakeview neighborhood spokesman Cindy Faw.

The fight has led the Charlotte Area Clergy Association to side with Darst and his church. Darst is a member of the clergy association

"It's total discrimination for them not to be allowed to worship in peace," said Gwendolyn Ferguson, a member of the clergy association's task force on gays. "The whole message of the Bible is to love your neighbor"

The New Life MCC congregation is now meeting at the Unitarian Universalist Church of Charlotte while awaiting the town's permission to renovate the garage building it bought for $50,000.

But during the seven weeks it met in north Matthews, Darst said the congregation was the target of harassment that caused attendance to dwindle from 35 to eight. Among other things, he accused residents of leaving a bag of feces in the church mailbox, disrupting a service by the sound of a chain saw and making a death threat.

Area residents, in turn, claim some church members have tried to bother them by riding up and down the street in front of their homes.

Gay ROTC cadet leaves USC

Columbia, SC—Even as he prepares to leave the university where his budding military career was sidetracked by a debate about homosexuality, former ROTC cadet Jay Belangia says he still wants to be an officer.

That goal might be impossible. The 24-year-old Hartsville native stirred up headlines when he declared that he was gay while a member of the University of South Carolina's ROTC program.

Belangia is preparing to leave USC but has not decided where he will go. He said he wants a fresh start and probably will go to a college in a larger city. He has his eye on a career in law or politics, maybe both, but still wants to serve in the military as an officer.

"Personally, I feel good," the 24-year-old Hartsville resident said. "For the first time, I'm really happy. I'm not hiding behind a facade, making up stories about who I'm

But he said he is leaving USC with mixed emotions because he made friends who supported him. He also said he is disappointed with USC's leadership, which he said seemed indifferent to his assertions that he was being discriminated against.

"I'm just looking at it as a learning experience," he said.

Belangia lost his ROTC scholarship last summer after a disciplinary hearing where he was charged with not maintaining good grades and not participating in drills.

In addition to being dismissed from USC's ROTC program, he also was told he must repay an estimated $3,000 in ROTC scholarship money, Belangia said. He is appealing that ruling.

After coming out, Belangia said the flak he caught because of his candor made life so miserable he couldn't function as a student, let alone as an ROTC cadet.

By the end of the spring semester, USC's ROTC leaders brought him up on charges that his grades had fallen below minimum standards and that he wasn't showing up for mandatory military activities.

HIV records stolen from hospital

Miami—Burglars at a hospital made off with computerized records of at least 6,000 vices, said several codes protect the information from easy access. But the theft prompted

Police said the burglary at Jackson Memorial Hospital, in which three personal computers and several diskettes were taken, may have been an inside job. They said burglars got by double-locked office doors.

The burglary was discovered Nov. 15 but officials didn't publicize it until recently for fear of alarming patients.

The names were on a list of people served by the South Florida AIDS Network. Barbara Loyd, the network's administrator, said the agency has copies of all of the stolen records.

Jim Towey, secretary of the Florida Department of Health and Rehabilitative Services, said several codes protect the information from easy access. But the theft prompted Towey to send inspectors to check security at 35 county health departments and AIDS agencies across the state.

State law makes unauthorized disclosure of records of HIV-infected people illegal, and hospital administrators and health officials said there was no evidence that any of the names had leaked out since the burglary.

But AIDS activist Jim Pruitt said: "This is really disturbing...People are really fearful about their confidentiality. Some of the people who receive services are acutely sensitive to this, and understandably so."

FBI Settles Buttino's Suit, Bans Discrimination:

Fired gay FBI agent Frank Buttino didn't get his job back, but he still considers the outcome of his lawsuit against the bureau a triumph. The FBI tentatively settled the suit out of court last week, agreeing not to discriminate against gay employees or applicants. The agreement goes further than Attorney General Janet Reno's memo barring discrimination based on sexual orientation, because it forbids discrimination on the grounds of "homosexual conduct among consenting adults in private." Buttino was not reinstated, but he will get a partial restoration of his pension rights and $53,000 in legal fees.

Mass. Gov. William Weld has once again taken bold action to protect the rights of lesbian and gay citizens.

Mass. Governor Signs Student Gay Rights Law: On Dec. 10, Massachusetts Gov. William Weld, a Republican, signed into law a bill that bans discrimination against gay students, making Massachusetts the first state in the union to enact such a law. "The governor feels schools should be places where students can learn," said Weld spokesperson Virginia Buckingham. "No one should be discriminated against based on their sexual preference." Opponents of the new law blasted Weld for his "total subservience to the homosexual lobby." "The next step is homosexual programs in public schools that specifically affirm the gay lifestyle, and that will be done at taxpayer expense," said C.J. Doyle, director of the Catholic League for Religious and Civil Rights.

Transsexuals Not Protected By Federal Law: In tossing out a case brought by a transsexual woman against Amtrak, U.S. District Judge Herbert Hutton has found that federal laws protecting men and women from sex discrimination do not apply to transsexuals. Andria Adams Dobre filed suit against Amtrak after her supervisors began to harass her following her admission that she was undergoing hormone treatments to become a woman. The harassment forced her resignation in March 1990. Dobre's lawsuit will be appealed to a Federal Appeals Court panel in Philadelphia.

Lawsuit Filed To Overturn Montana Law Against Gay Sex: Saying Montana law encourages discrimination and violence, six people filed a lawsuit in early December to overturn the provision making gay sex a felony. Rosemary Daszkiewicz, an attorney for the plaintiffs, said the challenge is based on the Montana Constitution's guarantees of individual privacy. "Montana's lesbians and gay men are seeking only this basic freedom—to keep the government out of their bedrooms," she said.

Lutherans' New Sexuality Statement Will Stand On The Bible: The nation's largest Lutheran group has vowed to keep closer tabs on a task force that provoked widespread protests for supporting gay unions, but the church is not backing off from the sex wars. The Church Council of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America voted to appoint an 11-member consulting panel to work with the task force in order to insure that any official policy on human sexuality would stand on biblical foundations and the confessional tradition of the church. The move came after parishioners from around the country protested a 21-page report released in October that urged church members to challenge traditional condemnations of homosexuality, and argued that supporting and even moving toward a practice of blessing committed same-sex unions is "strongly supported by responsible biblical interpretation."

Idaho Citizens Alliance Only Halfway To Signature Goal: The founder of the Idaho Citizens Alliance says his volunteers have collected only about half of the signatures they need to put his anti-gay initiative on the 1994 general election ballot. But Kelly Walton says that he is confident the goal will be reached and exceeded by the July 8, 1994 deadline. "We will not settle for a 55 percent win," he said. "We are going for a 70 percent landslide."

Magic Johnson HIV Infection Lawsuit Dismissed: Retired basketball star Magic Johnson and a woman who accused him of infecting her with HIV reached a private agreement that brought dismissal of the woman's lawsuit. U.S. District Judge Richard Enslen signed the dismissal order Dec. 9, saying only that lawyers on both sides requested it. There was no indication in his order whether a financial settlement had been reached. Attorneys for Johnson and Waymer Moore refused to divulge any details.

Amy Morris leaving ARCA post in January

Atlanta-Amy Morris, the executive director of AIDS Research Consortium of Atlanta (ARCA), has resigned her position, effective January 1

"I'm basically tired. I've been here for 4 1/ 2 years and seen [ARCA] grow and grow and grow. I need a break," said Morris, who said she had no immediate employment plans.

Morris, who joined ARCA in 1989, is one of the longest serving directors among Atlanta's AIDS service organizations. During her tenure, ARCA grew from a staff of six and a budget of $150,000 to a staff of 23 and a budget of more than $1.3 million.

"I think ARCA nationally is regarded as one of the top three community-based AIDS research agencies in the field," she said. Morris cited ARCA's ability to bring a large variety of HIV treatment trials to Atlanta as one of her achievements as director.

Morris has been active on a national level as well, serving as Chair of the Protocol Interest Group of the Community Programs for Clinical Research in AIDS (CPCRA), a program of the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases. She has also been an active member of AmFAR's Community Based Clinical Trials Network.

"We have been lucky to have her skill and dedication over the last 4 1/2 years as Executive sored by Centers for Disease Control and Pre-Director. She has seen ARCA through a critical phase of growth and has given us a strong foundation for the future."

Thompson will serve as interim director until a new executive director is named. A search committee is now being formed to conduct a national search, which should be complete by March.

ARCA is a non-profit association of 47 physicians and three public clinics that provides clinical trials of promising treatments for HIV and its related illnesses. # Judge strikes down Colorado's hate amendment

Colorado lesbian/gay groups call for an end to the nationwide boycott of the state

Denver- Amendment 2, a measure passed by Colorado voters last year which overturned existing lesbian/gay rights ordinances and prevented any further extensions of civil rights guarantees based on sexual orientation, is unconstitutional, a Denver judge has ruled.

In a 17-page decision issued without comment last week, Denver District Judge Jeffrey Bayless said the amendment violates "the fundamental right of an identifiable group to participate in the political process without being supported by a compelling state interest." He made permanent an earlier temporary injunction that had kept the amendment from ever going into effect.

In the wake of Bayless' ruling, a coalition of Colorado-based lesbian, gay and anti-Amendment 2 groups called for an end to the nationwide boycott begun after voters approved the measure last November.

"The boycott was successful in creating national awareness about the right-wing threat to civil rights and democracy in America," said Lawrence Pacheco, a spokesperson for Equality Colorado, a Denver gay/lesbian rights group. "However, it is time to end the boycott and move forward together by employing other strategies to secure civil rights protections for lesbians, gay men and bisexuals.'

The National Gay and Lesbian Task Force announced that it also supported an end to the boycott.

After Amendment 2 passed, the religious right launched similar petition drives in several other cities and states, including Florida. So the win in Colorado-where opponents of Amendment 2 successfully argued that the measure violated federal constitutional guarantees—may have nationwide ramifications.

"It sends a powerful message to the proponents of anti-gay rights nationwide that they cannot strip away the civil rights of lesbians and gay men nationwide and that their efforts offend our nation's constitution," said Suzanne Goldberg, an attorney for the Lambda Legal Defense and Education Fund in New York. "It's a terrific ruling. The ruling is a strong affirmation of gay and lesbian civil rights.'

Mary Celeste, an attorney for the plaintiffs who sued to overturn the law, including the three cities who have passed lesbian/gay rights measures (Denver, Boulder and Aspen), said the ruling puts other cities and states where similar laws are pending on notice that "they'd better be careful not to step on the toes of fundamental However, Assistant Colorado Attorney General Tim Tymkovich said the state likely will appeal the decision to the Colorado Supreme Court. "We had a very difficult burden to meet," Tymkovich said. "We thought we put up as strong as evidence possible under the circumstances.

Gov. Roy Romer, who opposed Amendment 2 when it was on the ballot last year but has drawn fire for his decision to defend the amendment in court, says he supports the state's intent to appeal. "We need a final decision. What we need to do is to put this question to rest finally one way or another. The judge has ruled, but obviously it needs a final answer," he said.

Both sides say the matter may eventually wind up being decided by the U.S. Supreme Court.

VOX controversy shows bankruptcy of homophobia

Jonesboro teenager Candie Stiles' description of the fundies says it better than we ever could:

"I guess they just want to put teenagers in a hole so when we get 50 and our ideas have developed into what they think they should be, then they can drag us out into the world again," she told the Atlanta Journal-Constitution.

Stiles writes for VOX, a newspaper for teenagers distributed throughout metro Atlanta that is now verboten in Clayton County's high schools. School officials, perhaps realizing how foolish and reactionary this decision—and the subsequent media attention—was making them look, now insist the paper was removed because of a policy that doesn't allow any free newspapers in its schools. They insist it just was a coincidence that the policy was enforced after VOX ran an article on lesbian/gay teenagers in September and parents complained. Or so goes the party line.

At first glance, the VOX controversy would seem to be another disheartening episode of homophobia running amok among public officials in suburban Atlanta. But there are a few heartening things here.

First off, the kids who are putting this newspaper together sound pretty cool. Those of us whose teenage years are but a fading memory-and who sometimes despair at the power of the forces arrayed against us-can see hope for the future in the idealism of Stiles and her cohorts. Unlike the educators who are supposedly preparing them for the future, these kids realize that teenagers today don't live in a Beaver Cleaver world.

VOX has written articles about homeless teens, AIDS and whether cops should be stationed in schools. Controversial, yes, but, as Stiles asks, where is "the utopia where society does not have to deal with controversy of any

It's not in Clayton County, no matter what the leaders of the school system might believe.

Teenagers who are acknowledging their lesbian or gay identity often find themselves alone, isolated and confused. An article that lets them know that they are not alone, that they are not some kind of freak, could literally have been a lifeline. For straight teenagers who grew up in households where they were taught homophobia or inflicted with religious zealotry, the article might have opened minds.

And that is exactly why anti-lesbian/gay forces are struggling so hard and so mightily against exposing their children to any information that presents lesbians or gays in a positive, or even in a neutral, light. They are afraid their children will become gay or lesbian (refusing to admit, of course, that their kids either already are or they aren't). They are afraid of allowing their children to take an objective, open view of the issues surrounding homo-

Which leads us to ask them this question: Why are you afraid? If you are so sure that God is on your side and that you are right, why not let your children hear our views and your views and then decide for themselves what to think? After all, if your point of view is as correct and blessed as you insist it is, then you should have nothing to worry about. Your views will triumph. Your children will choose to judge as you judge.

The reason the Christian supremacists can't let that happen is because, if all information is presented objectively, their viewpoint won't prevail, and, at some deep level-buried below generations of mind control—they know it. They cannot allow their children to conclude that lesbians and gays don't deserve hate and condemnation because that would usher in a society where diversity is appreciated, not feared. And that would threaten the foundations of their narrow world.

The fundies can't win on a level playing field of reason and ideas—even with the children under their control-so they must try to tilt the field. And that is the surest sign of the moral and logical bankruptcy of homophobia.

Clayton County may have won this battle and stopped the free exchange of ideas (although, given the rebellious nature of teenagers, we would expect and hope that VOX is pretty hot reading material these days). The parents who didn't like VOX and complained about the paper have managed to get it out of the schools.

But while the people who seek ignorance have won this time, they simply don't have enough ammunition to keep winning forever. And that is the most heartening thing of all.

Community should work against Skandalakis' arts attack

The Fulton County Arts Council, which has been crucial to the survival of arts and cultural groups throughout our county, is under attack from the newly elected chairman of the Fulton County Commission, Mitch Skandalakis. The new chairman does not believe in government support of the arts and has clearly expressed interest in abolishing the Fulton County Arts Council entirely, saying "it's an item that this county government just

Let the lesbian and gay community put two and two together.

Recent history with National Endowment for the Arts and funding for the arts in Cobb County, along with Skandalakis' complete refusal to address the gay community during his recent campaign, combine to show us that the chairman's aversion to arts funding is as antigay as it is anti-tax.

While arts funding makes up less than 1 percent of the county's half-a-billion dollar budget, the arts bring back a return of 13-to-1 in economic impact, from everything from increased business at parking lots to attracting corporate headquarters to locate in Fulton. Arts funding also keeps alive theater and other arts venues which give our community a voice with which to speak the truth about our lives and dreams. Elimination or severe reduction of the funds allocated to the [arts council] would be a devastating blow to the economic health of Atlanta and Fulton County and a major setback to our political and personal

For once, let the lesbian and gay community make the first strike. While Skandalakis is still testing the winds with talk about de-funding the arts, let's make it clear in no uncertain terms that he will have a fight on his hands. The sooner we present a strong and unified front with other art-supporting and progressive constituencies, the sooner this single rightwing voice will be drowned out. Let's end the fight before it even gets started.

Please call-or, better yet, write-Chairman Mitch Skandalakis and tell him that you think the arts are a vital part of the fabric of Fulton County life and that you support continued funding of the arts through the Fulton County Arts Council.

Ho, ho, homo. Deck your halls with rainbow colors

(Strings swell here. In perfect pitch and harmony...all together now)... "I'm drea-ming of a gaaaay Christmas...just like the one's I'm going to know. Where the tri-angles glisten. And pa-rents listen. To hear things...they can't wait to know..." (Full fade of sleigh bells here)

Have you opened your gay and lesbian holiday mail yet?

Oh, I hope so. There's a raft of it.

This year it's possible to deck your halls in rainbow colors, trim the tree with triangles and send friends and family season's greetings in true reflection of the holiday spirits (which ever ones you choose to invoke) and reflection of the actual kinds of family we really have. All courtesy of the virtual gay and lesbian mall in the mail.

I've just come back to South Florida from business in Boston, that grim, gray, brownbrick of a city, where holidays do look and smell like Christmas cards say they're supposed to.

Take Thanksgiving, which I had no choice but to do there, what with business sometimes demanding more of me than I can force through a fax machine. The Northeast fed me full of steamy breath and crunchy grass and blowing on my hands inside the car until the engine warmed the windows enough to see through the intersections. Thanksgiving morning sported perfect flurries—just enough to catch on your tongue and not enough to stick on the ground and send your Toyota careening into moving objects, all at outside temperatures I usually see only on the setting inside my Amana.

Back home again (where winter chill means you wear a sweater with your shorts), I found the season working hard at itself, as it has to every year when you live in a semi-tropical climate. When you're plucking citrus off backCleaning Out yard trees in December, and snow persons aren't an option, you really do have to rev up for Christmas, pump the air conditioning up to Permafrost to justify flambe-ing the Yule log, and delude yourself into believing that barbecued Christmas Turkey would have been a holiday tradition if Bethlehem had either turkeys or Weber kettles. The whole region throws itself bodily into the celebration starting about, oh, I'd have to guess conservatively, around, uh, say, Labor Day.

I came home ready to have some holiday, pumped by the New England winter to tackle the tree and trimmings, to slide into the shopping spirit. And what did I come home to find awaiting me in my mailbox? An amazing array of us-oriented home holiday shopping networks. Bookstores address me personally. Lambda Rising, the Washington D.C. book buyerie, for one, and A Different Light, out of New York and San Francisco, and, of course, my locals all sent invitations to string my tree with lesbian and gay literary lights.

A whole new raft of postcard people delivered themselves with what they imagined were my needs. Saffile came into the mailbox unbeckoned, but not unwelcome. As did a host (or hostess?) of other card carriers with names employing our sacred language: Triangle Corporation, Out Company, Community Partnership, Family Firm, Rainbow Send-Us-Your-Bucks businesses letting us know who was soliciting our disposable incomes, while theoretically keeping the postal person uninformed.

And the catalogs came along in the pouch. Olivia Records and Cruises became O-lesbian Mail Order for the duration. The American Male could, properly, change its name to The Gay Mail. And, of course, all our local community emporia are busy clamoring all over their 29 cent stamps to tell us what they have in store for us. This year, these folks upped their tonnage considerably. And, frankly, I think it's a blessing.

Why should L.L. Bean get a single cent from us? Nor Spiegel or Sears & Roebuck. Not till their white sale sections feature anything His and His in chenille. Not till their wedding sets also come in Hers and Hers sizes. Not while Shocking Gray is an alternative.

Shocking Gray is, if it's not the oldest (a tradition since 19??), it's certainly the snappiest of the queer catalogs. 32 color pages balanced politely between the politically correct...where else are you going to find a first page photo of a black woman in a Santa suit?...and the yupwardly (Oops! make that gupwardly) trendy...hammered silver and bronze champagne flutes, anyone?

This year for Saint Presents Day, you can order:

Aprons and pillowcases and shower curtains and ironing boards with abs or buns of steel if you're into that sort of thing...or know someone worthy who is.

Queer stamps in money shapes and sizes. Greeting cards with couples who look like us. (If we happen to be same-gender elves. Or hand-holding gingerbread men.)

We can order rainbows in T's and double-knits. And denim. To go with the rainbow temporary tattoos. Got a gay pet? Of course there are collars for the kitty and the puppy in our favorite primaries.

You can stuff your stocking with lambdas in sterling, freedom rings in crystals or steel, or buttons and bows and beads.

You can send Mapplethorpe calendars to your friends in Sin-cinnatti.

Or, for a slight sum, register your commitment and your union at the Equal Marriage Rights Fund.

It's not too late to get commitment cake toppers in appropriately matched sets for your Yuletide bondings. Try ordering those from your average Italian bakery.

There is everything in this catalog for a Yuletide merry and gay, but maids a-milking and lords a-leaping. Although, it isn't exactly clear whose buns those are on the pillow cases. There is a small shortage of swans a-swimming. But, hey, there are only so many pages, right?

I could go on and on about what great gay and lovely lesbian things you and I can now get to come COD direct to my door with a simple free phone call. Instead, I think I'll just go order something in a Fa-la-la-la-lavender.

What a great way to spend Christmas: Ho-ho-homo for the holidays.

Emory doing research

A front page article in the Dec. 2 Southern Voice made the statement that Atlanta lacks an AIDS clinical trial group (ACTG) site and that the nearest access to ACTG drug trials is in Birmingham, Ala. However, Emory University's Division of Pediatric Infectious Diseases, Immunology and Epidemiology is currently an ACTG site involved in several clinical trials. The division has been actively involved in AIDS research since participating in [a] trial of intravenous gamma globulin in 1988 and has been an ACTG site since 1990.

Due to the commitment of several Emory pediatricians and research nurses, dozens of families in Georgia have had the opportunity to enroll their children in state-of-the-art AIDS treatment trials over the years. Currently, there are children enrolled in five different ACTG drug trials with two trials pending enrollment.

These trials for children and adolescents are administered through the pediatric clinic of the Grady Infectious Disease Program at the new Ponce de Leon Center.

We appreciate NAPWA's advocacy efforts and encourage their continued support of all people with AIDS—including children.

Editor's note: These letter writers are Emory medical staff members working in pediatric services. The story in question was referring to ACTG programs offering services to adults with HIV/AIDS, which Emory has not initiated until now. The nearest site offering a full-blown adult ACTG program is in Birmingham.

A time to appreciate life's precious gifts

by JOHN KAPPERS

I sit drinking my morning coffee, even though it irritates the sores in my mouth. It was one of my favorite times of the day that I won't let go of, even though it's no longer enjoyable.

I will find out today whether the chest X-ray is improving, whether I'll survive this episode or if I am getting worse. It was difficult to get much sleep last night.

It was six months ago, which seems like last week, that I had an intact immune system and excellent health. It feels just like the MARTA bus story—like I suddenly got hit one day. I don't know if it would have been easier if it had been a more gradual decline. I think so.

For 10 years after diagnosis with ARC, I remained in good health. After the first couple of years, I lived my life to its fullest potential, experiencing new careers, homes and a truly wonderful lover. And I had believed I was living each day to its fullest potential.

But it is now that my health has slipped away from me that I completely realize what a precious and fragile gift it was. I don't know if it's possible to convey that message to others. I hope and believe that it is. At the top of our list of gifts this year should be an appreciation of our good health and what we can accomplish for ourselves and our community with this gift.

I continue to believe that despite the horrible losses of this holocaust,

But it is now that my health has slipped away from me that I completely realize what a precious and fragile gift it was.
I don't know if it's possible to convey that message to others. I hope and believe that it is.

we will become a more empowered, loving and stronger community that truly learns the lessons it has brought us.

Studies suggest some T-Cells far more effective than others in combating HIV

Washington, DC-Scientists are trying to HIV-specific in their blood, he said. determine if some people have very specialized immune cells that recognize the disguises of HIV, and, if so, how to boost that advan-

Research into how T-cells deal with HIV is in its early stages, but it might explain why a few people infected with HIV have lived healthy lives for more than a decade while others succumb quickly, researchers said.

"How you do depends on whether your T-cell recognizes what your virus shows it," said Dr. Robert Schooley, chairman of a national conference on AIDS and related viruses that convened in Washington last week. "The tricky part is: Can we modify that somehow to boost your response?"

Cytotoxic T-cells are the body's killer cells; they attack disease as soon as they recognize it. In a person infected with HIV, the virus enters a cell and waits until some still unknown mechanism triggers it to replicate, sending various proteins and peptides out of the cell.

Different strains of the virus emit different proteins in different people at different times. If the T-cells don't recognize them as a sign of disease, they won't attack. But new research suggests some people have T-cells that specifically target certain HIV proteins, and thus do better at fighting the disease.

Dr. Thomas Harrer of Harvard Medical School is studying HIV-infected people who have remained healthy for more than 12 years without taking any anti-retroviral drugs. Ten of these people, the first with complete data, have high levels of immune cells that are

Also, some T-cells specifically bind to certain epitopes, the coatings on cells to which peptides cling. Harrer is finding several epitopes in long-term HIV survivors that haven't been described in HIV patients be-

So the question becomes: Do these people have genetically superior T-cells, or do those cells combine with certain epitopes to offer protection against full-blown AIDS?

There's not enough data to begin answering either question, Harrer emphasized. "We haven't even proven that T-cells are the only link to these people's survival. There could be other co-factors we don't know about," he said. "This is the first step in a very long process to find what strategies the immune system is using in these people."

The topic is hot. More than half a dozen papers citing preliminary data on these Tcells were presented at the First National Conference on Human Retrovirus and Related Infections.

"These findings are giving us an impetus to push immune-based therapeutic approaches," Schooley said. "We're trying to demonstrate a cause-and-effect relationship."

Another study showed that these HIVspecific T-cells start appearing in infancy. A study of HIV-infected infants at the University of Colorado found babies with mild AIDS symptoms began developing precursors to these T-cells by age 10 months. But one who died at 18 months never developed any of the killer cells.

Survey drastically lowers estimate of American's infected with HIV

"The criteria for the

NAPWA's Mark King,

"...It's like looking for their windows."

survey of AIDS infections conservatively estimates that about 550,000 Americans carry the virus, which is considerably less than previous government estimates.

The new figures, released Dec. 13, represent the first attempt to estimate the scope of AIDS infection in the United States by directly testing ordinary Americans. They were based a randomly chosen sample of 7,992 households and compiled by the National Center for Health Statistics.

The most widely accepted estimate of AIDS infections has been compiled by the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. It projects that about 1 million Americans are infected, a number that has remained virtually unchanged since the mid-1980s.

In fact, the researchers who conducted the latest survey said theirs is a conservative estimate, because it covered only people who live at home, not prisoners, the home-young men in the study were slightly less likely than other participants to allow their blood to be drawn for AIDS testing, and this too could have led to an underestimate of the infec-

NAPWA/Atlanta Executive Director Mark King agrees

that the survey methods were flawed. "The criteria for the survey was a joke," he said. "They did not interview people in prison, or in the hospital, or people already connected to the AIDS support system. It's like looking for Christians among those with Chanukah bushes in their windows.

"The scary part of this is that these numbers will give ammunition to those who want to downsize the crisis," he continued. "Those who oppose increased funding or people who want to limit the public's perception of how large a pandemic this really

Dr. Geraldine McQuillan, who presented the new data at a medical meeting, said the CDC figures may have overestimated the extent of the epidemic in the past but they might not be far off now because the new survey has a margin of error. The true number, based on the new survey, could range anywhere from 300,000 to 1.02 million, she said.

The new study, she said, "implies the epidemic is slowly increasing in the general population. It is not exploding."

McQuillan's interpretation suggests that earlier estimates were inflated, and the epidemic is still on the increase. However, others said the research could mean that

Washington, DC-The first nationwide more people are dying of AIDS than are catching new infections, so the total number infected is actually falling.

> The CDC based its calculation largely on statistical methods that attempt to judge the number of infections by looking at the number of AIDS cases. Only actual AIDS cases are reported to health agencies, not people who are infected with HIV but have not gotten sick. People with HIV often remain outwardly healthy for 10 years or

Dr. Scott Holmberg of the CDC said that because of deaths from AIDS, the total number infected has fallen and may now total perhaps 700,000 or 800,000. "Because more than 200,000 people have died of AIDS, we would expect that the current prevalence is below 1 million. It may not be as low as 550,000," he said.

As of Sept. 1, almost 400,000 AIDS cases had been reported to the CDC since the epidemic began in the early '80s, and less or hospitalized patients. In addition, about 202,000 people have died of the dis-

The new survey was conducted between 1988 and 1991. It was presented at the National Conference Human Retroviruses and Related Infections, sponsored by the American Society for Microbiology and other organizations.

Of the nearly 8,000 people tested, 29 were found to carry HIV. This works out to just over one-third of 1 percent of all Americans. Blacks were four times more likely than whites and three times more likely than Mexican Americans to be infected, according to the sample. The highest infection rate was among black men between ages 18 and 39. The survey found that 2.5 percent of them carried the virus.

Another survey presented at the meeting suggested that the number of AIDS infections has leveled off. Dr. Susan Davis of the CDC presented data based on routine blood tests performed on more than 2 million newborns annually.

The screening is done primarily to check for metabolic diseases. But the same samples are also tested for AIDS antibodies. Babies get antibodies from their mothers, and the presence of AIDS antibodies suggests that the mother was infected.

In 1989, 1.6 of every 1,000 mothers of newborns in the United States was infected with HIV. By 1992, this had risen to 1.7 of every 1,000. In the Northeast during this period, the infection rate fell slightly, while in the South it increased a bit.

Dr. Katz currently serves as Regional HIV/AIDS Physician Coordinator for the Southern California Permanente Medical Group and is the medical advisor to the LA Shanti Foundation and Being Alive LA

Katz opened his presentation with a discussion of the latest statistics and their meaning. Yearly totals of new full-blown cases in the U.S. and Europe are expected to top out within the next two years. As the numbers become stable, the typical patient profile will continue to change. In Los Angeles, 25 percent of new infections are now women. Among LA's young gay men aged 25 to 29, infections have dropped from 49.5 percent in 1984 to 22 percent in 1992. AIDS is rapidly becoming a heterosexual disease in the US.

Pregnancy is a major concern among HIV infected women, according to Katz. Motherto-child transmission occurs in about 20-30 percent of pregnancies. Risk factors for transmission include natural deliveries, low CD4 counts, and a positive test of the P24 antigen.

Dr. Katz expressed concern that some patients were seeing shady practitioners who promise that their treatments will result in a negative HIV antibody test. He warned that such claims are ludicrous. Even if a drug comes along that kills every HIV cell in the body, the antibodies would remain, and continue to be detected by antibody tests.

Gathering new interest are small numbers of HIV infected people that appear to have no immune dysfunction. In a study of San Francisco gay men who have been infected for at least 13 years, 7-8 percent show no immune dysfunction at all. About a third Atlanta NAPWA presented Mark Katz, show some dysfunction, but have not yet had any symptoms. Similar results have been reported among African prostitutes. New studies organized to learn why these people survive so well.

Dr. Katz reported that in a study of patients on Bactrim, no new cases of PCP have occurred. Many patients, however, have allergic reactions to this inexpensive oral alternative to pentamadine, but they can frequently be countered by desensitizing methods that have proven to be quite effective.

Many Kaposi's Sarcoma patients are reporting few, if any side, effects from the drug, Doxil. Dr. Katz cautioned, however, that some patients respond better to different treatments.

With CMV treatments, Dr. Katz reported that Ganciclovir is less toxic than Foscarnet but results in lower survival rates. Among anti-retrovirals, Dr. Katz reported that d4T may prove to be the best of the nucleoside analogs, which include AZT, ddI, and ddC. HIV resistance to AZT occurs more slowly if started while CD4 counts are still high. More research confirms that combining two antiretroviral drugs works better than one drug alone. And combining three drugs may be even more effective than two.

Dr. Katz endorsed making healthy lifestyle changes to improve one's chances of survival. But he added that if a change—such as giving up a special treat that has too much sugarmakes one unhappy, perhaps it's not such a good idea. If drinking Classic Coke brings special meaning, by all means, keep drinking NAPWA's next Treatment Forum will be held January 16 at Colony Square. It will feature Dr. Larry Bruni discussing studies of Interleukin-2, an immune booster.

But other AIDS experts said much more research is needed just to determine whether the urine test is valid. If it is, it's still a long leap to making generalizations about vacwas well-tolerated by them, doctors said. "This is very much pioneering work," said Dr. Howard Gendelman, a scientist at the University of Nebraska Medical Center.

The clinical study was the first performed with a blood-filtering device developed by Dr. Simon Skurkovich of Advanced Biotherapy Concepts Inc. of Rockville, Md.

Plasma from a patient's blood is passed through a column-shaped device and back into the patient. Specially coated beads remove toxic substances that cause such symptoms as fever, chills and weakness. The device which targets toxins rather than HIV is not seen as a potential cure for AIDS.

And it is too early to know whether the device will be an effective way to reduce the symptoms of the disease, said Gendelman, chief of the medical center's just the presence of HIV, he added. laboratory of viral pathogenesis.

During the five days that each patient underwent treatment, levels interferon alpha-which is produced at toxic levels by people with HIV—were reduced in the blood, Gendelman said. The amount of a second substance, tumor necrosis factor, that is responsible for weight loss in HIV infected people also declined. The two substances are related because they stimulate production of

After treatments ended, the levels of both substances rose again, anywhere from hours to weeks later. Additional studies will be done to see whether the device can be used to suppress levels of the two substances for prolonged periods, Gendelman said.

In the course of the research, scientists isolated a type of interferon that is specifically associated with HIV Gendelman said. That interferon has unique properties that may make it possible to develop a test that will predict the onset of AIDS as opposed to

T-cell changes can predict AZT effectiveness

New blood filtering treatment shows

Changes in a patient's CD4 count can predict whether treatment with the anti-HIV drug AZT will be effective, according to study at Johns Hopkins University.

The scientists followed 747 HIV-infected patients who had taken AZT for an average of two years. They found that patients with rising CD4 cell counts took longer to progress to AIDS than those with falling cell counts. Patients who had rising cell counts also had a longer survival time than patients who had falling cell counts.

Among those with CD4 cell counts of 400 and higher, for instance, the patients whose cell counts rose by about 50 after six months of AZT treatment took 10 months longer to progress to AIDS than the patients whose cell counts dropped by about 50. They also lived an average of five months longer.

"This should help doctors and patients plan when to add new drugs or change treatment, so that patients have the longest period of AIDS-free time and extended life," said Dr. Neil Graham, one of the scientists who conducted the study.

PWA Jeff Getty's health has improved after receiving white blood cell transfusions—but he got them only over the objections of the bureaucracy back in the world of the living.

San Francisco-In early September, it looked like Jeff Getty was going to die. The 36year-old Oakland resident's immune system was so devastated by AIDS that his CD4 cell count had dropped to the 15-20 range, a number so tiny as to be essentially insignificant. Chronic pseudomonas, a lung infection, was dragging him down slowly but surely, and the antibiotics being used to treat it weren't working. Constant fevers and fatigue left him capable of only the most minimal activity. It looked like the beginning of the end.

But as Christmas approaches, Getty is up and around again, feeling better than he has in months, and the pseudomonas is in full retreat. He credits his survival to an experimental treatment that, he and others involved charge, greed, bureaucracy and medical politics nearly stopped him from getting.

Getty is a longtime member of ACT UP/ Golden Gate's treatment issues committee, well connected in AIDS medical and research circles and often in a position to hear news or speculation about new treatment ideas. One of the ideas he heard "being tossed around," he remembers, was the idea of combining intravenous gamma globulin treatments with infusions of white blood cells from a healthy, HIVnegative sibling in hopes of jump-starting an AIDS-depleted immune system.

Two people he knew had some interest in the idea were Dr. Alan Levin, the sometimes controversial physician perhaps best known for his involvement in the 1989 "underground" trial of Compound Q, and Curtis Ponzi, a San Francisco counts, he says, is that he feels attorney with a long history in AIDS issues and currently a member of Project Inform's board of directors. "So I called Levin and Ponzi," Getty recalls, and after going over his medical situation in some detail and consulting with his regular physician, Dr. Virginia Cafaro, "we decided to start in on it."

It was, he says, a fortunate combination of a doctor nervy enough to try something relatively new and unproven and a knowledgeable patient without many other options who was willing to say, "let's do it." And at that point, having thoroughly run the course of conventional treatments, Getty's doctors didn't have much else to suggest. "The only other option they were offering me," he remembers, "was, 'Get your affairs in

The proposed treatment would definitely be an adventure into little-charted territory. Although there are now several published studies documenting the usefulness of gamma globulin infusions in AIDS treatment (reducing the number of opportunistic infections and improving the patient's general health), there is very little such data about white blood cell transfer between siblings.

There have been a few promising tests involving identical twins, but identical twins are, in medical jargon, "HLA (human leukocyte antigen) matched"-that is, when cells from one twin are given to the other, the recipient's body doesn't recognize the new cells as foreign invaders, and vice versa. This means that the potentially dangerous reactions known as "graft versus host disease" (in which the new cells attack the recipient or "host") and "host versus graft disease (in which host's immune system attacks the new cells, similar to "rejection" of an organ transplant) don't occur.

But when the donor cells come from anyone other than an identical twin-in Getty's case, two sisters were potential donors—the best you can have is a partial HLA match. In such an "allogeneic" cell transfer, some amount of graft versus host/host versus graft reaction is much more likely and could be serious.

But, notes Dr. Levin, the host versus graft reaction can also be "a potent booster of the immune system." What should happen, essentially, is that the host's immune system destroys the new cells and then cannibalizes the components of those cells-"sort of like eating very nutritious food," Levin explains—giving the patient's immune system a boost.

More directly, it was hoped that the new white blood cells, which would include all the basic components of a healthy immune system, would attack the bacteria in Getty's lungs, bringing the pseudomonas under control.

Levin was convinced the dangers were minimal. "There's never been a graft versus host reaction reported in an HIV-positive patient," he explains, except in cases where some other circumstance, such as chemotherapy, has caused additional damage to the patient's immune system. In the early years of highdose AZT, he points out, thousands of patients got blood transfusions without prob-

Still, there is very little published data on this type of procedure in AIDS patients. That is not to say, however, that no work on allogeneic cell transfer has been done. Dr. Stephen Hauptman of Thomas Jefferson University in Philadelphia did white cell transfers on a number of patients in the mid-1980s, with results that those who have seen his data describe in terms such as "intriguing but not conclusive." Hauptman's work was never published—in part, some speculate, because scientific interest at the time was focused almost entirely on antiviral drugs rather than on immune-based therapies.

Hauptman will say very little on the record about his past work, except to emphasize that "we're not sure if we have anything that's enticing." Still, he remains interested enough in the idea to be doing further work on it, adding that it will be about six months before he has results he

Doctors from the Center for Special Immunology, a chain of private AIDS clinics in California, Florida and Chicago, gave a somewhat controversial report at last summer's International AIDS Conference in Berlin about their white cell transfer work. They described their procedure as "safe and well-tolerated" and said it showed some signs of effectiveness—a characterization that drew considerable fire from those who felt that the company had glossed over the significance of the deaths of three patients in their study.

The subject of allogeneic white cell transfer has also come up in the series of immune restoration think tank meetings convened by Project Inform over the last 18 months. "We've seen some fairly compelling results," comments Project Inform's Brenda Lein, adding that further research is being done.

Overall, although there wasn't a lot of solid data to go on, Levin was convinced there was good reason to give the idea a try and that the risks were fairly minimal. So, on Sept. 14, Getty was admitted to the University of California-San Francisco/Mount Zion Medical Center, blood was drawn from his sister and the white cells separated out, and final preparations for the first infusion were begun.

That, it seems, is when complications—not of the medical variety—began to arise. Attorney Ponzi, who handled many of the discussions with Mt. Zion, says that at first the hospital had told him and Dr. Levin that the infusions would not need to be reviewed by an institutional review board, or IRB, which is a neutral body set up to monitor the safety and ethics of clinical trials of experimental drugs or medical procedures. The reasoning, he says, was that the procedure was simply "a transfusion of an unaltered blood product," in many ways not unlike a common blood transfusion.

But suddenly, Ponzi says, the tune changed. As Getty was being prepared for the procedure, the administration at the hospital decided the procedure needed IRB approval, a requirement that Ponzi says "was dropped on us at the last minute."

"There was a lot of politics," Levin complains. "We had jumped through the appropriate hoops, and every time we jumped through one hoop, they wanted another hoop." With the patient already set up and ready to go, Levin simply went ahead. "Eventually," he continues, smiling broadly, "they came up and said, 'You can't do this.' And [Getty] said, 'It's already done."

Levin says that there was "absolutely no good scientific or ethical reason" to require IRB approval for the procedure, and that the sudden objections came primarily because he has been an outspoken and sometimes controversial figure. "I'm not politically correct," he says.

Hospital officials flatly refused any specific comment on the matter. Chief of Medicine Dr. Kenneth Woeber offered only a general statement that "it is normal hospital procedure to have an institutional review board approve any experimental treatment before it is used."

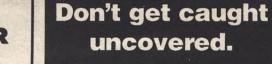

But it wasn't just the hospital administration that seemed to be getting in the way. The day before the procedure was to take place, Levin received a letter from attorney representing Dr. David Senechek, a partner in the medical group in which Levin was formerly a partner. Levin had sold his interest in the group about three years ago, and the buy-out agreement included a "non-competition" clause in which Levin agreed not to practice AIDS medicine in San Francisco for a designated number of years.

"They claim that I'm competing with them, and I signed a no-compete [agreement]," Levin says of the letter. "But [Getty] went to them and they wouldn't do it...So then I did it and they come after me, they wanted me to stop."

Getty was, to put it mildly, upset at what seemed like an attempt to stop his treatment. "I ended up in a fight with them to allow this man to tell me the information that he knew," he bristles, "and to help me with my project. And they basically tried to stop him because he had a non-compete clause.

"That's not right," he continues. "You can't divide patients up into little fiefdoms...When somebody has knowledge and information that could save your life, you don't want to put up with somebody's legal contract trying to censor the person you're dealing with."

For Getty, who had good reason to feel the white cell transfer might be his only shot at avoiding imminent death, the swirl of legal and business complications that suddenly engulfed him was a frightening and unsettling experience. "It was like being in the Twilight Zone of medicine," he recalls with a shudder.

Senechek insists that it was never his intent to interfere with Getty's treatment and that the letter was prompted by rumors that Levin was treating other HIV patients.

Despite the procedural complications, that first infusion went fairly smoothly, marred only by an allergic reaction to a new antibiotic Getty was given. Although unpleasant and somewhat nerve wracking, the reaction was "a good sign," explains Levin, an indication that the patient's immune system was showing signs of life.

And once the allergic reaction passed, Getty says, he almost immediately began to feel healthier than he had before the cell transfer.

But the procedure was never intended to be a one-shot deal, since there was little reason to hope that the new white cells would give Getty's immune system more than a temporary boost. It would need to be repeated every few weeks, and before the second infusion could happen the hospital's insistence on IRB approval would have

But all, it seemed, was not well at Mt. Zion. Attorney Ponzi says he had heard that "some of the doctors were getting cold feet...Supposedly they were thinking of 'investigating' the doctors involved" in the transfusion. The hospital was insisting that its IRB review the procedure.

An unhappy Jeff Getty, by now convinced that the first treatment had indeed helped, went to his colleagues in ACT UP/Golden Gate and explained the situation. The result was a pair of strongly worded letters, one to Woeber and one to Senechek, telling each of them, in essence, to back off. Negotiations continued, somewhat tensely, until the matter was finally resolved. The hospital would accept the opinion of Project Inform's IRB, which has given its approval for the procedure.

answer for late-stage AIDS patients? No one involved would dare to make such a claim as yet for what Levin himself calls a "chewing gum and bailing wire" approach to patching up a tattered immune system. It is axiomatic in science that one case, no matter how dramatic it may appear, doesn't prove that something works. AIDS and its attendant infections are unpredictable enough that much more experience will be needed before firm conclusions can be drawn. The research now under way may provide answers sometime next year.

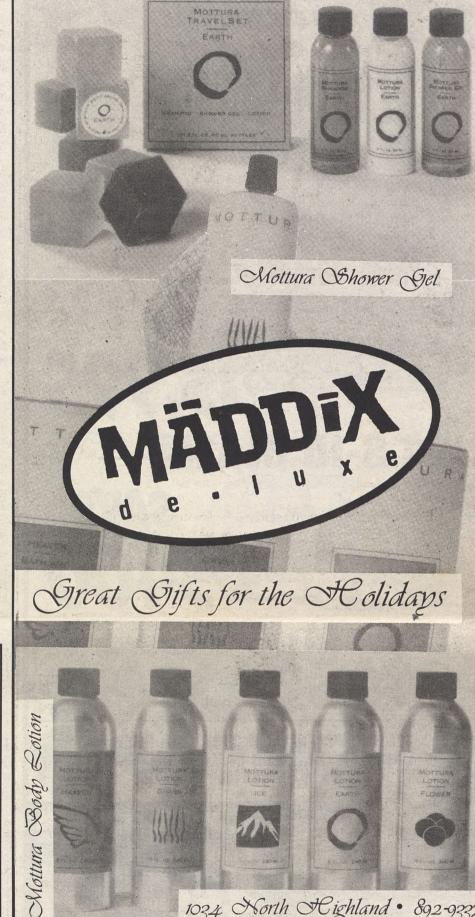

But on a broader level, Levin is convinced that a major factor delaying progress against AIDS is a combination of conservatism and petty rivalries that have kept innovative approaches from being tried. "We have all the tools available right now" to fight AIDS, he declares.

Business considerations and turf battles "have been interfering with the care of patients ever since I've been involved," Levin continues, the emotion beginning to rise in his voice. "It's very disheartening to have to deal with this terrible disease—and then the politics, and then the greed. And the thing that's stopping [progress] is greed."

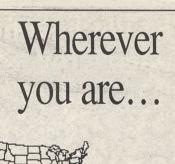

For people who must depend on doctors to help them stay alive, Ponzi says, the unhappy lesson is, "Don't always assume that physicians are always going to act in the best interest of patients. Sometimes there are other considerations.'

"The politics of medicine suck."

The extended haggling had delayed Getty's second treatment by nearly three weeks. Difficult as the struggle was, the story seems—so far, at least-to have a happy ending. After four treatments, Getty is feeling better than he has since last spring and is back to a fairly active schedule. "I feel great," he enthused as this article was being written. "I'm going to the gym tomorrow." Although his blood work shows only fairly modest improvements in his CD4 and CD8 numbers, what counts, he says, is that he feels back in the world of the living. So is sibling white blood cell transfer the sioner was acting under a 90-day deadline to either approve or reject the extension of partnership benefits, Bowers said he "had to" issue the opinion.

"If the commissioner of insurance [had waited for the court to rule], this would have gone into effect by default," Bowers said. "From my standpoint, I've got to act as a legal advisor. I've got to give advice."

The city's insurance companies had filed a request with Ryles' office to offer the coverage, which was approved by the City Council and Mayor Maynard Jackson this summer. Under state law, changes in insurance coverage have to be submitted to the insurance commissioner's office and, if they are not rejected within 90 days, are automatically approved.

However, according to Teresa Nelson, executive director of the Georgia ACLU, that section of the insurance code is normally used to stop insurance companies from cutting back on the coverage they provide—not prevent them from expanding coverage.

"It was directed at protecting citizens from fraud and abuse," she said. "It is supposed to prevent restrictions of benefits from one group or another. I've never heard it being interpreted as saying you can't give additional benefits."

Nothing in the section of the insurance code dealing with approving proposed changes in coverage required Ryles to seek the attorney general's opinion. But Curtin claimed that Ryles "had to" ask for Bowers opinion in the matter because the issue was "a point of law."

"We have to ask the top constitutional officer in the state to interpret the laws of the state of Georgia," Curtin said.

After a group of conservative partnership opponents sued to overturn the partnership ordinances, Fulton County Superior Court Judge Joel Fryer refused to grant an injunction preventing the ordinances from going into effect. Bowers' decision, in practical terms, accomplished what the judge hearing the case refused to do.

Bowers went beyond what Ryles had asked for in his opinion, not only ruling that the benefits ordinance was illegal but that the city's domestic partnership registry was also illegal because it, and the benefits ordinance, "quite clearly create a legal status or relationship" that is not allowed by the Georgia constitution. To make that point, Bowers rejected the argument that, under the constitution's home rule provisions, the city should be allowed to determine how to dispense benefits to its employees.

"They do [have that right], except they don't have the authority to change civil relationships in the process. That's my view," Bowers said.

"Based on what Bowers said, there should be no preferential treatment for veterans, the elderly, disabled," said Nelson. "Only the state would be allowed to do that—and that would include curfews that keep teenagers off the streets at certain times. That's creating a 'legal status."

Any decision by Fryer that the ordinances are legal would supersede Bowers' opinion. But until, or if, that happens, the benefits portion of the domestic partnership ordinances will have no practical effect.

Bert J. McDowell

AIDS activist Bert McDowell, 39, died on Saturday, Dec. 18 due to complications from AIDS. Bert was surrounded by loving friends, family and his dog Wally when he left us. He had been fighting a courageous battle with AIDS

Bert devoted many hours of his time to AIDS activism. He served on the board of the Living AIDS Memorial Project from 1989 to 1990. He was on the board of Atlanta NAPWA since 1990, serving as president for two years. Bert was also a representative of the HIVaffected community on the State AIDS Task Force for the past two years. Bert's empowered response to his diagnosis positively impacted the lives of many people with AIDS. His strength in confronting the challenge of living with AIDS was an inspiration to those with whom he shared his life.

South Carolina and was a long-time Atlanta resident. He was co-owner of Alligood-McDowell which he founded. Bert enjoyed spending time with his friends James, Keith, in lieu of flowers.

Tim, John and Julie, travel, the beach, music, reading, gardening and his dog Wally.

Graveside services were held on Dec. 20 in Bert graduated from Wofford College in Spartanburg, S.C. An Atlanta memorial service will be held in January.

Bert requested contributions to the AIDS Survival Project (formerly Atlanta NAPWA)

Don't sell your life insurance... Until you talk with us.

When you or a friend is selling a life insurance policy, it's a sink or swim situation. Today, there are companies popping up like weeds that would love to buy your policy. They say they're "gay-friendly" with their pink triangles. Some of them show you their friendly faces and promise you the most . . . can you really trust them? It's unfortunate, but working with one of these companies can cost you in the end.

Being the only fully funded, gay owned and operated settlement company, we understand your needs. Page & associates, inc. has built its reputation by providing the best personal service the industry has to offer - from computerized client tracking to frequent follow-ups and same day fund transfers. We're dedicated to you. We don't look at our clients as just another investment. With clients nationwide, our Life Program meets the special needs of the gay terminally ill, both financially and personally.

Bevins agreed, adding that the spirit of cooperation from those she contacted was an added plus.

"For all of us to be coming together and not have all the infighting and outfighting was really neat," she said.

Bevins hopes that the holiday project is only the beginning of a long-term effort with the DeKalb community. With volunteers from her groups already set to participate in Santa's "The difference was that we were doing it visit to the South DeKalb Community Center, she's already looking to other ways for the lesbian and gay community to participate more fully—and visibly—in the larger community.

Second Coming

"Perestroika," the concluding installment of Tony Kushner's acclaimed epic "Angels in America," is now open in New York

by MICHAEL KUCHWARA

New York City—When we last left "Angels in America" in May, a feathery white messenger had crashed through the ceiling of a dying gay man's apartment to announce: "The great work

Indeed, it does-brought about by a wondrous display of strong, often vivid writing, memorable characters and a warmer, more effective production.

With the opening Nov. 30 on Broadway of "Perestroika," the second half of Tony Kushner's monumental "Angels in America," a seven-hour odyssey into the psyche of 1980s America reaches an emotionally satisfying, cathartic conclusion.

What Kushner has attempted is nothing less than a clarion call for future generations—both gay and straight—to embrace life, no matter what happens. The excesses of the last decade, defined by the playwright as the greed and moral bankruptcy of the Reagan and Bush years, have been inflicted on two couples, one gay, the other outwardly heterosexual. Both are changed forever.

The moral center of Kushner's play becomes apparent in "Perestroika," which has received a more personal approach from director George C. Wolfe than the initial "Millennium Approaches" did. That center rests in an AIDS-ravaged man named Prior who, in Kushner's opening installment, is abandoned by his lover.

In Part 2, instead of meekly accepting his fate, Prior is energized, particularly by that angelic visit. He's transformed into a prophet for his own time. As played by Stephen Spinella, who won a Tony Award for his performance in "Millennium," Prior is a mesmerizing presence. Dressed like a spectral monk, he travels throughout the play, affecting everyone he

His most interesting encounter? With Harper, a pillpopping Mormon, whose husband, Joe, has run off to live with Louis, Prior's equivocating ex-helpmate. Harper's delusions in "Millennium Approaches" include a visit with an imaginary travel agent to the ozone layer above Antarctica. In the second play, she has taken to gnawing pine trees in Brooklyn's Prospect Park.

Joe, a Republican lawyer, does not find happiness with Louis and seeks solace from his mentor, Roy Cohn. Cohn—played with cadaverous glee by Ron Leibman—is also suffering from AIDS. It's not the disease that bothers him. It's the lack of power he has in fighting it despite his highplaced Washington connections.

Kushner's characters interse with amazing ingenuity. Prior's confidant, a finger-snapping ex-drag queen named Belize, ends up as Cohn's nurse. Joe's seemingly straight-laced mother sells her house in Salt Lake City, moves to New York and gets a job at the Mormon Visitors Center where she meets Prior.

Much of the criticism of "Perestroika" when it was done last year at the Mark Taper Forum in Los Angeles centered on its heavy-handedness, its didactic underlining of the obvious. Not much is in evidence now, after Kushner furiously rewrote the script up until a few days before the opening.

Kushner's writing exhibits an effortless dexterity and range. He can go from learned philosophical discussion to political satire to campy humor in the space of a few sentences. It's quite a high-wire act, but the playwright never

If Leibman and Spinella have the play's showiest roles, they are nearly matched by several actors in the company. Particularly memorable is Joe Mantello as the cowardly Louis, a man adept at justifying everything he does, no matter how morally reprehensible it is.

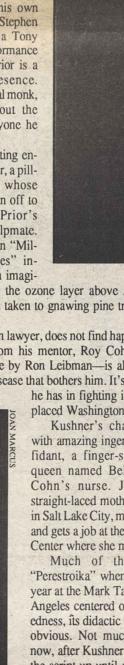

David Marshall Grant expertly captures the anguish of a man distered by his Mormon and Republican righteousness but who succumbs to his sexual urges. Marcia Gay Harden is heartbreaking as the distraught Harper, valiantly struggling to maintain her self-respect and self-worth after her husband disappears.

If Wolfe's approach to "Millennium Approaches" seemed cold and clinical, he has softened the production's hard edge for "Angels" more hopeful second half. He's helped by Kushner's expert detailing of character which, by the time "Perestroika" is over, puts a half-dozen fully realized people on stage.

Nowhere is that softening more appropriate than in "Perestroika's" final scene, played out in front of the Bethesda Fountain in New York's Central Park—with yet another angel, this time the fountain's statue, standing guard over the proceed-

Prior, fittingly, gets to deliver Kushner's exhortation for a better life, a new beginning or a perestroika. The speech makes the angel's announcement at the end of "Millennium Approaches" all the more prophetic and moving. An impressive achievement.

Kuchwara is a critic for the Associated Press. "Perestroika" is playing at the Walter Kerr Theatre, 219 West 48th St.

Stephen Spinella (right) and Joe Mantello (left) renew their roles as Prior and Louis, lovers whose relationship is challenged by AIDS.

Rio heats up heading into New Year's and Carnival

by BILL GEIGER

Everything you've heard about Rio de Janeiro is true. Endless miles of pristine tropical beaches. Handsome, dark men. A population whose passion for music and dance is so fervent that it seems to be in their blood.

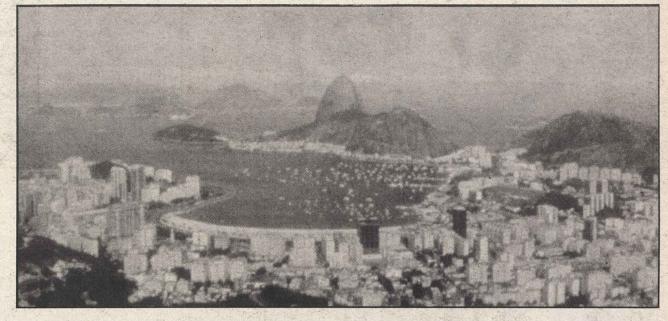

So are images less positive: massive crime and gangs of young thugs, poverty, unemployment and illiteracy; a spectacular rate of inflation; and an HIV-infection rate that rivals New York City

Despite its drawbacks, the world's 10th largest city at 11.4 million has long been—and still is—a major draw among gay tourists, ever since the international jet-set crowd that made the Copacabana beaches and clubs famous during the '30s and '40s While its social structure echoes the patriarchal machismo of the rest of South America, Rio is unusually tolerant of sexual diversity, and this almost casual attitude toward sex has attracted and encouraged a large gay and bisexual community.

The first impression of the city is its scenic setting, which sprawls out from the downtown and beach areas, nestled between crystal-blue ocean tropical green cliffs and jagged mountains. Much of the city is squeezed between Guanabara Bay and rocky hills that form the edge of Tijuaca National Park, an 8,000-acre tropical forest. But what makes Rio memorable is its people—black, white, brown and all shades in between—all seemingly in pursuit of pleasure. Beaches and bodies beautiful, samba and cerveja, football and cachaca; it is a culture alive and vibrant, influenced by the technology of the West, but retaining its own identity and charm.

The Brazilian summer, which begins in December and runs through March, is highlighted by New Year's and Carnival, for which throngs of tourists, including thousands of neighboring South Americans, converge on the city. For the gay traveler, these grand celebrations, along with prices that remain low, even when the dollar is doing badly overseas, make a trip to South America's largest country one that will long be remembered—and likely repeated.

The best place to start exploring? The beach, which is the choice destination during the hot and often humid summertime. Half of the Brazilian population is under the age of 20 and of modest economic means, so the beach has become a popular social gathering place—and the crowded atmosphere has a culture all its own. When the sun is at its greatest strength, everyone heads for the water to play in the surf and make conversation. It's a great chance to make new friends and find out where the hot spots for the evening will be.

Wandering down the beach, you can watch the cariocas jogging or playing sports such as volleyball (one type played with hands, another, simply amazing to watch, that requires quick reflexes and coordination because the hands and arms are not allowed) and futebol (not the American variety). Guarana—a soda with a distinct taste made from the berry of an Amazonian plant—can be had from one of the many roving vendors (not as many or as pesky as those at Mexican resorts).

The best of Rio's beaches, formerly the long stretch known as Copacabana but now including the communities of Leblon and Ipanema, are lined with miles of hotels, apartments, restaurants and clubs. This area, known as Zona Sul, is inhabited by the middle and upper classes (ironically, the poor live on the hill-sides in favelas, shanty towns with remarkable views of the city and bay). The famous curved beach at Copacabana is in a district as narrow as four blocks wide; its population density is one of the highest in the world. Avenida Atlantica runs along the ocean, separated from the beach by a long black-and-white mosaic sidewalk, perfect for strolls, jogging and cruising. Copacabana is home to the majority of tourists, though its popularity has long ago begun to fade. It's also the center of lively theater, and prostitution and sex industry. And besides being pricey, Copacabana is riddled with crime.

Many of the wealthier, older gay tourists still go to the "Bolsa" on Avenida Atlantica, across from the Copacabana Palace on Copacabana Beach. That's where one also finds the hustlers, transvestites and transsexuals, including younger Brazilian boys looking for older tourists who might take them to a better life—if only for the evening. An afternoon at Maxim's, a large sidewalk cafe next to the Palace, is the ideal spot to watch both visitors and natives stroll by

About two miles south on Avenida Atlantica are the more desirable beaches at Ipanema and Leblon, residential districts that are composed of mostly middle-to upper-income families, with many of the better restaurants, clubs and shops.

When Carnival is in full swing, the latenight singing, dancing and partying lasts four successive nights. Though the event is a cultural gold mine, prices rise a bit and city services tend to grind to a halt.

Carnival consists of three main features; the street scene, the traditional club balls and the world-famous samba parade. The most spontaneous of the events are the daily street parades, which break out in many parts of Rio. In essence, they are colorful marches begun by roving bands of musicians who play non-stop samba music (the quick-paced, wildly energetic Brazilian national music, a composite of European folk influences and African techniques brought by the slaves), while the after-beach crowds—numbering up to the thousands to tens of thousands—follow them through the city streets.

Carnival nights belong to the club balls, which attract both cariocas and tourists. The best of these events is the one atop Sugarloaf mountain, accessible only by cable car, that offers a breathtaking view of the city. Another popular ball is the Scalia Ball, which closes Carnival and overloads all sensory perceptions. The transvestite balls are quite popular as well.

The centerpiece of Carnival is the two-night samba parade down Avenida Marques de Sapucai, witnessed by 85,000 ticket-holders and millions of television viewers. Introduced in 1928, long after the origins of Carnival, it did not become popular until the 1950s. To the untrained observer, the 20,000 cariocas dressed in lavish costumes and the soaring floats are a glitter chaos, but in reality it is a competition between 14 samba schools in design and music where each school's efforts must be based on a historical event, personality or legend. Thousands of dancers and musicians perform roles in presenting each school's theme, which is reflected visually in the costumes and float.

Though the dark-to-dawn parade has come under criticism for its move toward Las Vegasstyle opulence, this is Carnival's most obviously class-oriented event. Samba schools are comprised overwhelmingly of working and poor people from the city's sprawling suburbs, who dress up as royalty and strut before the rich folk in the stands and boxes. Before wildly cheering spectators who are as much as a part of the experience, marchers cover the one kilometer route in non-stop dance and song in about 50 minutes. Soaked with sweat and literally exhausted, they are hosed down by municipal water carts.

As it does in Carnival, religion plays an important role in daily life. Brazil has the largest Catholic population in the world, but there are also strong influences from African sects started by black slaves. One example is the New Year's Eve celebration where millions of people in Rio and Bahaia go to the beach to pay homage to Iemanja by throwing flowers, perfumes, fruit and even jewelry into the seas.

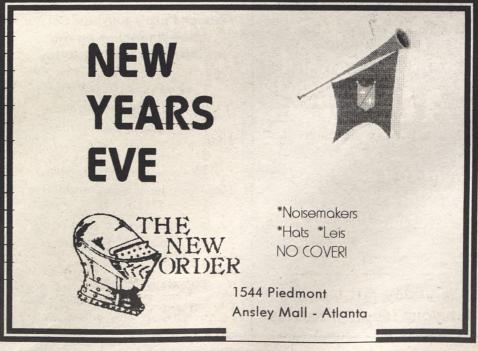

With these Afro-Brazilian religions come multiple gods. Two of them—Logunde, the son of two male gods, and Oxumare, who is male for half the year—are considered bisexual and are often the saints of homosexuals. Cult mythology condones homosexuality, which may partly explain Rio's laid back attitude toward gays—though incidents of anti-gay violence are not uncommon

Unfortunately, the combination of tourism, machismo, poverty and easy sex has also left the city with a severe AIDS problem. Brazil had the third-highest reported incidence of AIDS after the U.S. and France, and the areas hardest hit are

Gosh, Toto, we're not just in the movies any more

Stage production of "The Wizard of Oz" stays faithful to the film classic

We're off to see the Wizard again, only this time he's appearing on stage.

That's right, not the big screen—the stage. More specifically, the Fox Theater. The new touring production of "The Wizard of Oz," based on the Royal Shakespeare Company version, is on a tour that includes the U.S., Canada, South America and Southeast Asia and bows in Atlanta on December 23.

The Wizard of Oz

runs Dec. 23, 25 and 26 at the Fox Theater. For more information, call (404) 817-8700. The production features music we've come to know and quote from the 1939 MGM classic, with the addition of one number that was cut, "The Jitterbug." The director of the film, at least the one who got the credit (there were actually four, including Victor Fleming, who was pulled off the project to work on another classic from 1939, "Gone With The Wind") was King Victor, who cut "The Jitterbug" in order to shorten the film.

"Somewhere Over The Rainbow," which won an Oscar for best song in 1939, "Come Out, Come Out, Wherever You Are" (which has become an anthem of sorts for the gay community) and "Ding Dong! The Witch Is Dead" are all in place, though, so don't worry about director Richard Ericson trying to fix something that isn't broken. Apparently, Musicals America, the producer, knows better than to tamper with a classic, which is more than we can say for Alexandra Ripley ("Scarlett") and her publishers.

When L. Frank Baum first wrote his book "The Wonderful Wizard of Oz" it became an immediate success. It remains one of the best-selling children's books of the 20th Century. Its longevity can perhaps be attributed to the success of the film, which has lived on through reissues and television. So a stage version was probably inevitable.

"Time" magazine said of the film's reissue in 1949, "...true wizardry, whether in books or on film, is ageless. In the magical land of Oz, nothing ever changes...The whimsical gaiety, the lighthearted song and dance, the lavish Hollywood sets and costumes are as fresh and beguiling today as they were 10 years ago." The gaiety of the piece, as we all know, is also celebrated.

For the stage version of the musical, set designer Kent Homchick has created a world every bit as strange and charming as the one in the film. The Wicked Witch of the West appears in a blast of smoke, Munchkinland dazzles with brilliant color and The Emerald City glimmers and beckons. To create some of the incredible characters in the story, Musicals America hired The Big Nazo Puppets, a Providence, Rhode Island company, to make creatures as diverse as singing apple trees, flying monkeys, a munchkin chorus and a 15-foot "Oz" head. The incredible task of building the 175 costumes needed for the show fell to designer John Carver, who developed some new and some familiar outfits to amuse audiences.

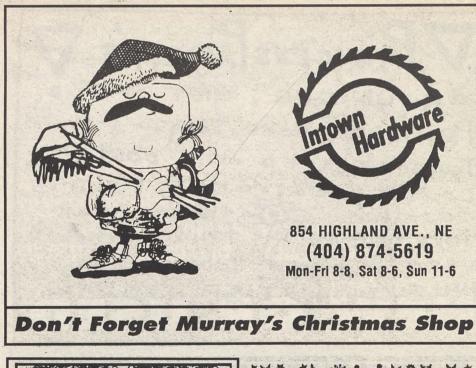

The show also features some local talent. Alonzo Saunders, a graduate of Avondale High School, will be performing in three supporting roles, as a member of the Lollipop Guild, an Emerald Citizen and as a Winkie. In fact, everyone in the cast does double duty at least, with the exceptions of Dorothy and Toto.

"Flying by Foy," the special effects company that is famous for originating flight patterns for "Peter Pan," handled all the flying sequences in this production. And what would "The Wizard of Oz" be without flying monkeys and Miss Gultch's bicycle zooming through the tornado?

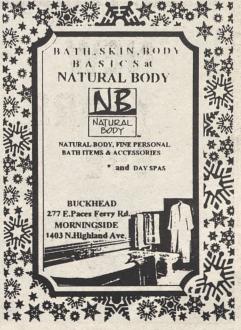

Since the film version of "Oz" has always managed to appear on television during the holidays, it seems appropriate that the stage version arrive at the same time. So put on your ruby slippers and visit the land of Oz—in person, this time.

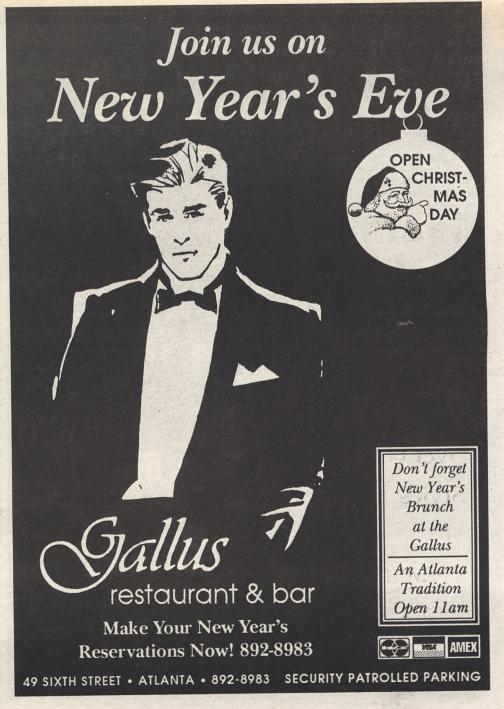

BRIAN COCHRAN

Showtimes for "The Wizard of Oz" are Thursday, December 23 and Saturday, December 26 at 8 p.m. and Sunday, December 27 at 2 and 7:30 p.m. Tickets are available for all performances at Ticketmaster outlets and the Fox Theater Box Office.

the two largest cities, Sao Paulo and Rio.

When dining in Brazil, one quickly discovers that the best foods are the exotic fruits and delicious meats, though the beef is usually heavily salted. A visit to a rodizioi offers all the meat you can consume for a fixed, relatively cheap price. For a quick bite after the beach, try a suco or juice bar. When planning meals, remember that lunch is served late and most restaurants don't begin serving dinner until after 10 p.m.

(Remember to be smart in terms of buying from street vendors. Avoid uncooked shellfish or vegetables, eat only fruit that must be pealed, drink only bottled water and refrain from ice cubes and fresh milk.)

There are a number of after-hours places. Zoom and Incontrus are popular discos, as is Elite, a claustrophobic wood structure that literally bounces vertically as the crowd pogos in rhythm to the beat.

Accommodations in Brazil can be very cheap, though luxury hotels in Ipanema and Copacabana are also quite expensive. Avoid crime-plagued Copacabana for Ipanema or Leblon, beach communities just two miles south. Reasonably priced apart-hotels not only offer clean rooms but include a delicious Brazilian breakfast as well. When booking rooms in advance, some hotels will calculate charge at the "official" exchange rate, which undercuts the value of the dollar by more than 20 percent. Try to avoid paying in advance, and then pay the bill in local currency obtained on the parallel market, which offers a better exchange rate value.

If you are travelling in high season (July or December through February) and planning to stay at a good hotel, get reservations in advance. Most hotels are regulated by Embratur, the state tourism authority which rates the hotels one to five stars. Air conditioning is a must. (Motels are rented by the hour as a solution for overpopulated living conditions, and should not be confused with hotels.)

Getting around the city is both easy and traumatic. Brazilians are notoriously awful drivers; with one hand on the horn, they have even been known to take to the sidewalks. As a pedestrian, don't expect the right of way. Buses are the primary form of transportation for Brazilians and are incredibly cheap, about 15 cents one way. They are, however, jammed during rush hour. Taxis are reasonably cheap, but make sure the meter is working or agree to a fare

Music, crafts and precious gems are among the best purchases, with the best shopping in Ipanema and Copacabana. Street vendors and outdoor flea markets, such as the Sunday hippy fair in Ipanema, offer great prices on Brazilian leather goods, minerals and artwork. Beautiful gemstones and fine jewelry are available at Amsterdam-Sauer or H. Stern.

The final word on Rio, regretfully, must concern crime. According to a Gallup survey, Brazil is the world's second most violent nation, topped only by Colombia. One needn't be paranoid, but common sense is a necessity. Robberies on buses, beaches and in tourist areas are extremely common. Thieves are often teenagers and work in gangs armed with guns or knives. Foreign tourists, especially those with an expensive camera, jewelry and bulging wallet are likely targets. Avoid high-risk areas, especially after sunset, and don't carry anything with you that you can't afford to lose. Carry little cash on public buses. Don't draw attention to yourself by dress or action. Bring only the minimum to the beach—towel, suit, suntan lotion, enough money for lunch and drinks. A disposable camera is cheaper to lose than a 35 mm variety. And finally be wary of anyone you might bring home with you—that's a common way to be ripped

One way to avoid attention is to dress like the natives—shorts, tank tops and light T-shirts are all you'll need, even in the evenings.

Dickens' Victorian morality play still rings true

"A Christmas Carol" still captivates the world 150 years after its debut

"I will honor Christmas in my heart, and try to keep it all year." — from "A Christmas Carol"

London-As he worked on a new story toward the end of 1843, Charles Dickens said he felt as if Tiny Tim and Bob Cratchit were ever tugging at his coat sleeve, impatient for him to get back to his desk and continue the story of their lives.

Although "A Christmas Carol" didn't immediately sell as well as Dickens had hoped, it came to exert that grip on the whole world.

Now 150 years old, its Victorian mixture of fireside merrymaking and spectral gloom and doom followed by triumphant redemption shows no sign of fading.

New editions are in the bookshops and new versions are on theater stages, television and radio.

Once more, the crusty miser Ebeneezer Scrooge is reformed and turned into a fairy godfather by Ghosts of Christmas Past, Present and Future who lead him through scenes of happiness, poverty and want.

Dickens had this to say about old Ebeneezer:

"Oh, but he was a tightfisted hand at the grindstone. Scrooge! a squeezing, wrenching, grasping, scraping, clutching, covetous old sinner! Hard and sharp as flint, from which no steel had ever struck out generous fire; secret, and self-contained, and solitary as an oyster."

"The current popularity of the story is as astonishing as ever," said Malcolm Andrews, lecturer in English literature at the University of Kent in England and editor of The Dickensian, which three times a year brings the latest in studies of the great

"Nearly 50 separate editions are in print in Britain and there are well over 225 adaptations for stage, screen and radio here and in the United States. It is also on cassette, record and compact disc. It is a ballet, an opera, a musical, several animated cartoons and several movies and its characters are used everywhere in advertising," Andrews said in an interview.

The story survives, he thinks, because of Dickens' "ability to tap a kind of folktale quality.'

"Although Dickens set it specifically in the 1840s, his original idea was to give it propaganda power to ease the hardships of the poor, to promote charity and give people a sense of the larger family community. One of the triumphs of the redeemed Scrooge is that he takes a fatherly responsibility for Tiny Tim, the crippled son of his poor clerk, Bob Cratchit," Andrew said.

Dickens got the idea when he visited the northern industrial city of Manchester where he made a speech referring to the necessity of educating very poor children. Cratchit and his family almost duplicate Dickens' own poor childhood, and the Ghost of Christmas Past leads Scrooge through the Medway river landscape of north Kent which Dickens knew from his boyhood in Chatham.

Seven months before he began the story Dickens had thought of Christmas appeals for poor children, hence their prominence in the tale. The Ghost of Christmas Present produces from his robes two abject children: a boy called Ignorance, and a girl named Want.

Dickens described them thus:

"Yellow, meager, ragged, scowling, wolfish; but prostrate, too, in their humility. Where graceful youth should have filled their features out, and touched them with its freshest tints, a stale and shrivelled hand, like that of age, had pinched, and twisted them, and pulled them into shreds."

The story has the feel of snow, cold air, green holly leaves and red berries and blazing hearths. The reader feels the beating of human hearts in good cheer and in dread.

Dickens confessed to being gripped by the story as he wrote it and said he "wept and laughed, and wept again."

He wrote to his American friend, Cornelius Felton, a professor at Harvard University, that it so excited him that he "walked about the black streets of London 15 and 20 miles a night when all sober folks had gone to bed.'

To the novelist Sir Edward Bulwer-Lytton, Dickens wrote that the subject seized him with strange mastery and that the writing of it so closely preoccupied him that he "never left the house before the owls went out, and led quite a solitary life.'

Dickens, then 31, wrote "A Christmas Carol" in about six weeks, from early October to November 1843.

He said he wanted to write a "cheerful, glowing, heartwarming story in which he would appeal to all of people's warmest feelings."

In fact, he needed money. He had a large family whose members constantly pestered him for favors and his latest novel, "Martin Chuzzlewit," was selling much less well than his previous books.

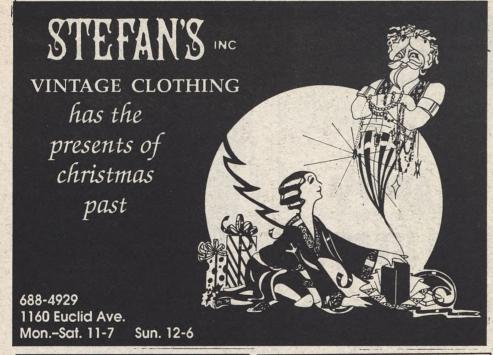

As a result, Dickens was even repaying Chapman and Hall, his publishers, for an advance they had given him, although his works had raised them from nobodies to wealth and fame.

Dickens insisted on a low price of five shillings, just under $5 in those days, for copies of "A Christmas Carol" as he wanted it widely bought and read. But he also demanded an expensive format, with gilt edges, colored end-papers, a blue and red title page and hand-colored plates by John Leech.

The "Carol" was published on Dec. 17 and by Christmas Eve one week later it had sold 6,000 copies. It went into a seventh edition within four months.

The novelist William Makepeace Thackeray said of it: "It seems to me a national benefit, and to every man or woman who reads it a personal kindness. The last two people I heard speak of it were women; neither knew the other, or the author, and both said by way of criticism, 'God bless him!' ... What a feeling is this for a writer to be able to inspire, and what a reward to reap!"

MARIA HELENA DOLAN

"Certain it is that the winter solstice was celebrated in antiquity as the Birthday of the Sun, and that festal lights or fires were kindled on this joyful occasion. Our Christmas festival is nothing but a continuation of this old solar festivity; for the ecclesiastical authorities saw fit, about the end of the third or beginning of the fourth century, arbitrarily to transfer the nativity of Christ from the sixth of January to the 25th of December, for the purpose of diverting to their Lord the worship which the heathen had hitherto paid on that day to the sun."

-Sir James Frazer, "The Golden Bough" ymbols hold great resonance, even when their original meanings have been obscured. Perhaps nowhere is this fact clearer than at the Yule, or Wheel, of the year. Despite how far we have in general distanced ourselves from the agrarian roots of our ancestors, a part of ourselves still hears faint snatches of their geocentric harmonies.

Christmas celebrations have existed for about 1,600 years. Solstice celebrations stretch back thousands of years before that. On the shortest day (and longest night) of the year, human aspiration naturally leans towards the return of the light, towards rebirth and renewal.

Long ago, humans believed that we had a very important part to play in ensuring the fulfillment of the sun's/son's return. We conducted rituals and imbued symbols with great power towards that end. Much symbolism presumed a familiarity with and acceptance of ritual sexual practices, because ancients understood the importance of the life force, and believed in the power of the Hieros Gamos, the Sacred Marriage.

For this reason, holly was sacred, as its red berries represented the power of women's blood. "The 'holy' holly was linguistically linked with Hel's yonic 'hole'" (Germanic Hohle, a cave or grave). It was the most sacred of trees. ("The Women's Encyclopedia of Myths and Secrets," Barbara G. Walker)

The berries are only borne on the female plant. And holly was used in wreaths, for "the circle of the wreath symbolizes the Wheel of the Year, the complete cycle." ("Wheel of the Year," J. Campanelli)

Holly's common use at Christmas is apparently the survival of an ancient Roman custom. While the Romans were holding this feast (Saturnalia), which occurred about the time of the winter solstice, they decked the outsides of their houses with holly; at the same time, the Christians were quietly celebrating the birth of Christ, and to avoid detection, they outwardly followed the custom of their heathen neighbors. ("An Encyclopedia of Occultism," H. Spence)

No less venerated was the tiny but potent mistletoe. Sir James Frazer cites the "Gallas of Africa" and the "Walos of Senegambia" amongst the multitudes who regarded mistletoe as the provender of great luck.

The almost ubiquitous oaks cults in Europe also revered the tiny plant. It is used to bring fertility, for either a child-to-be, or for a personal project of creativity. The berries represent sexual potency, and serve as an aphrodisiac.

An herb of immortality, mistletoe is seen as a symbol of rebirth, its energy containing the secrets of life beyond this, carrying the soul far into the future. It is traditionally hung over a doorway with red thread or cord to bring harmony and protection to the home.

Mistletoe banishes all evil and negative energy, and brings good fortune and joy to the user. ("The Master Book of Herbalism," Paul Beyerl)

Frazer says that mistletoe was known to contain the "seed or germ of the (solstical) fire, which was elicited from the wood of the oak...(Hence,) the sun's fire was regarded as an emanation of the mistletoe."

Interestingly, sacred oak cults continued throughout the Christian era. As late as 1874, an ancient oak-tree shrine was worshipped by a congregation led by an Orthodox priest. Wax candles were affixed to the tree, and the celebrants prayed "Holy Oak Hallelujah, pray for us." A drunken orgy ensued. Modern customs of kissing under the mistletoe are pale shadows of the sexual orgies that once accompanied the rites of the oak god. (Barbara Walker)

Inevitably, the good church fathers tried for centuries to suppress the carnal solstice rites. The story of St. Winifred, who missioned to 8th century Scandinavians, clearly delineates this.

As he (Winifred) hewed down a great oak tree, a young fir tree miraculously sprung up in its place. Saint Winifred then proclaimed the tree holy, saying it was the symbol of endless life because its leaves are ever green. "Take it up and carry it into the Chieftain's hall. You shall go no more into the shadows of the forest to keep your feast with sacred tires of shame. You shall keep them at home with laughter and songs and rites of love, gathered around the green fir tree to rejoice in the birth night of the Savior." ("The Book of Religious Holidays," Marguerite Ickis)

Consider the evergreen tree for a moment, however. Trees exist in three sacred zones: earth, underworld, heaven. They symbolically embody the power and knowledge of the Great Mother (the earth) and tree worship existed in many cultures. In the midst of spent fields and barren plants, evergreens promised the continuation of life.

No less a personage than Martin Luther brought an evergreen tree into his home in mid-December one year, and decorated it with (astonishingly pagan) candles, to demonstrate to his offspring "how beautiful the stars looked through the high branches of the fir forests as they winked in the sky." (Margaret Ickis)

This quite ancient custom of decorating evergreens was brought to England by the German Prince Albert, husband to Queen Victoria, in 1841. Germanic immigrants to these shores likewise had begun to spread the custom here—and naturally Anglophiles felt that, if the Queen and Prince decorated a tree inside Buckingham Palace, then surely they should do the same within their own homes.

The Christmas tree met with some resistance, however. "A young pastor by the name of Schwan, in Cleveland, Ohio, created a furor in 1851 by bringing a lighted Christmas tree in to his church. The town's decent people would not tolerate such a pagan practice!" (Margaret Ickis) (Schwan pressed his case exhaustively, and the townsfolk finally relented.)

Clearly, the long history of the symbolic employment of these plants signifies that they speak to some of the most basic parts of the human psyche. On some level, we all yearn to unite with the divine, however we conceive of it. The plants remind us that there are forces greater than ourselves, and that we are a part of life's spiral dance, instead of apart from it.

GAPTAIN SWING

Larry Duplechan's "Captain Swing" is indeed a love story, as the cover says, and it is a beautiful one. It is also a story about families rediscovering each other. It is about finding again the capacity to give up one's heart to love, and it is about being gay in a heterosexual family. But it is a love story with a distinct difference. This novel pushes aside more boundaries than the usual gay-man-going-home-to-a-small-town story.

In Duplechan's earlier novel, "Eight Days A Week," struggling young African-American night club singer Johnnie Ray Rousseau met and fell in love with Keith Keller, a blond fantasy a la Adonis. In "Captain Swing," Keller has been dead for a year, after sharing a 10 year relationship with Rousseau. Johnnie Ray has not been able to let go of his "widow's" grief, despite therapeutic intervention.

Now Johnnie Ray Rousseau is on his way back to Lake Charles, Louisiana where his father is dying. This is the same father who threw the adolescent Johnnie Ray out of his home for "taking some white man up the butt." This father supposedly asked for a visit from his son in the hospital before his death, and said son is nervously jumping at this last chance for reconciliation. Lured into the visit by a well-meaning aunt ("He's your daddy... I thought you should be here"), Johnnie Ray must again face cruel rejection by his weak and dying, but still mean-spirited, father.

Throughout Johnnie Ray's visits to his father's hospital bed and his re-acquaintance with Aunt Lucille and cousin Athena is the persistent presence of Nigel. The beautiful, chocolate-skinned Nigel with Hershey's-kiss nipples and firm muscles that pull his young smooth skin tight is Johnnie

Author Larry Duplechan continues the saga of Johnny Ray Rousseau in "Captain Swing."

Ray's much younger second cousin and Athena's son.

When Nigel tells his older cousin that he, too, is gay, the younger man begins a dance of seduction that seems sometimes calculated and sometimes innocent. Johnnie Ray is unwilling to cross this sexual boundary, however, and resists the younger man's advances for as long as he is able. But Nigel has more to offer Johnnie Ray than his well-pumped, youthful body, and Johnnie Ray needs the fresh breath of love that he hasn't felt since Keith's death. With this gorgeous and very sexy love story, Duplechan's novel questions the taboo on intrafamilial sexual relationships. As Nigel says: "Not like one of us was a woman or something and we was gonna make feeble-minded little black babies."

In spite of Johnnie Ray's initial resistance, he and Nigel share a very special (not to mention slick, wet, hot, sexy) intimacy that breaks the older cousin of his grief and reinitiates him to love. The younger, less experienced Nigel acts as stronger, caring confidante and brings his cousin back to reality. Nigel comforts Johnnie Ray when the older man wakes up screaming in the middle of the night over a reoccurring nightmare about his lover's death. He loves Johnnie Ray through the slapping pain of repeated parental rejection. He introduces Johnnie Ray to two senior gay men who live in this back-water Louisiana town, who tell him stories about his family that the family would have never divulged. Nigel also gently prods the older cousin back to the music that left him when Keith died. Nigel's tenderness opens up his cousin's heart and destroy's Johnnie Ray's resistance to his seduction.

But, through Nigel's interactions with Athena, the reader, if not Johnnie Ray, begins to realize that Nigel has another agenda in mind as well. Nigel, whether knowingly or not, uses his relationship with Johnnie Ray as a wedge to gain some independence from mom. Unfortunately the wedge also endangers a long and very special relationship between Johnnie Ray and Athena. If Athena were to reject Johnnie Ray because he was gay, or if Nigel's motivation were completely self-indulgent, the sympathetic reader could easily choose sides. But the reader is left with much more challenging considerations about alliance, and the author refuses to offer easy answers.

Duplechan embellishes the elegant sexiness and inherent frustrations of this story with the delightful wit of a clever, articulate queen. His campy sense of humor provides the balance that makes it the kind of book that keeps you up until four in the morning to finish and then lets you fall sleep feeling good about the world,

A FOOD COLUMN BY GARY KAUPMAN

One of my ideas of pure luxury is a long leisurely lunch with a friend. A meal of several courses, one that includes a glass of wine and is followed by a cup or three of really good coffee. A lunch that lasts at least an hour and a half; two turns of the clock's big hand are even better. The kind of lunch that isn't often available to those of us who toil at 9-5 jobs.

December's holidays are a perfect time for this idealized lunch of mine. Spirits are often high, but even if they're not, feelings are close to the surface. Isn't a soulful lunch as rewarding as an ebullient one? The week between Christmas and New Year's is an especially appealing time for these interludes. But since I have a schedule from hell that week this year, I took some time off last week for this year's take on my annual pilgrimage towards a relaxed lunch.

My foray was to Bistango (1100 Peachtree St., 875-7074). This is the space last habited by the meteoric Bice, which flew high when it opened, even higher when bad boy Paul Luna became the chef, and then crashed when Luna left in a huff. The dramatic space was originally done by Gotham design whiz Adam Tihany. I never visited that space, so I'm not sure what local designer William Johnson has done to change it, but the expansive room topped by a dramatic clerestory rotunda is definitely eyepopping. Entry, through the very woody bar and down a columned hall to the dining room is, well, dramatic. But despite the grand scale of all this and the main room's fairly cavernous feel, a reassuring palette of muted gold, green, red, purple and grey ties things together well and give the place a comfortable feel. (Well at least initially-more about those grey walls later.)

Bistango is the brainchild of Tom Coohill, who had a mixed record at City Grill but has gone on to popular and (generally) critical acclaim at the trendy Ciboulette. Early press described the fare here as "Mediterranean," but don't mistake that for lots of tomatoes, garlic and calamari. Lasagna is available, but it's made with roasted veggies. And there's an appetizer of cold smoked salmon (and an entree of the same fish, hot and smoked). Crabcakes come with serrano peppers (hardly a Mediterranean duo), but then a side of fennel salad gets us back to the right continent.

Even the fact that something sounds traditional doesn't mean that it will be. Lobster and shrimp minestrone turns out to be a based on a dark transparent broth devoid of vegetables, notably tomatoes. The shrimp and lobster are plentiful, tender and flavorful, but the soup is way salty and completely overwhelmed by the flavor of thyme. No fun, especially at $5.95 a pop.

There's nothing very traditionally Italian (or Spanish or French) about a bowl of potato soup enriched with goat cheese and lots of fresh basil, either. The strong flavors of the cheese and basil work much better here than the thyme does in the aforementioned minestrone, but this still doesn't strike me as a very amusing way to spend nearly $6.

Especially not when you can part with an additional $3 and have either one of the excellent entrees that we tried.

Wide flat papardelle noodles (in spinach and plain flavors) slathered with piles of beautiful sweet red tomatoes, mounds of exquisitely bitter broccoli rabbe, and not a minor amount of garlic, all in a spicy oil sauce, could hardly be better. The intensely colored dish is a treat to the eye and the heady, strong flavors challenge the tongue. (I should mention that the plates here are might easy on the eye too, some bordered with wide bands of strong solid color, others edged in smaller scallops of the same inviting tones.) For a variation on the theme, try piling some of the sauce on a chunk of the chewy, crusty white bread. Great stuff either way, and the serving is huge.

Equally yummy, though a little more outre, is a half of a roasted free range chicken served on a bed of room temperature veggie saladyellow squash, potatoes, onions, red and white beans, artichoke bottoms and other goodies. The beautifully browned chicken is packed with flavor, and the fresh tasting salad, dressed with what I assume is a citrus oil, puts the tastebuds in hyper drive. Once again, bits of the chicken and veggies piled on a piece of that rich bread come pretty close to heaven. And again, the serving size is more than

Which is nice because you can happily eat only half (take the rest home in an ecofriendly cardboard box) and have room for dessert. In this case an espresso and vanilla ice cream confection crusted with dark chocolate and presented as a pair of artfully interlaced triangles. A schnibble or two of chewy brownie stuck in the middle of all this adds even more interest, visually and to the tongue. An accompanying cup of decaf is rich, strong and especially clean tasting.

Service is friendly, fast and mighty efficient considering the restaurant's tender age.

So, aside from the disastrous minestrone, what's not to like here?

First, I'm struck by the disparity in price/ value between a mediocre bowl of $6 soup and a fabulous serving of $9 pasta or chicken not to mention $6 for a (better than decent) desert. Maybe the answer is to eschew the smaller courses and indulge in the more substantial ones, which are hardly cheap, but are a very good value given the luxe nature of the surroundings.

Then there's the matter of how the space feels. The look is big city, urban and chic. And fabulous as that all is, the cavernous proportions do not for an intimate dining experience make—especially on a cold, grey and rainy day when those somber grey walls add to the sense of gloom. Add to that the fact the temperature isn't exactly toasty and, despite the food, this, I fear, is not the ideal environment for my fantasy holiday lunch.

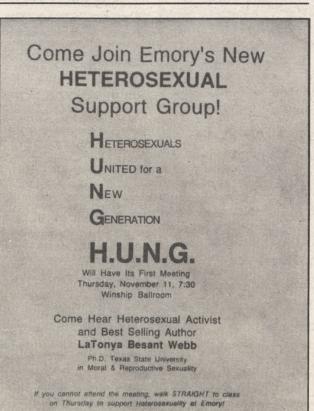

Bistango is a good place to discuss business, impress your clients, colleagues or relatives, see and be seen or feel like you're on the cutting edge of culinary consciousness in Atlanta, while having a really good meal in the process. Not at all a small set of accomplishments.

words into Condoms: We don't hear much any more about the so-called peace dividend that was all the rage a few years ago when it appeared that Communism's demise would vanish our need for the Pentagon and all its nasty little endeavors. What we do hear is that defense contractor Wainwright Industries in St. Peters, Mo. (they supply parts to giant McDonnell Douglas) has retooled (so to speak) part of its production line to make what looks like a digital pager but is actually a condom carrying case. The spiffy little Protecto Pager sells for a mere $9.95 and allows those who are embarrassed by the sight of a foil package in their pocket or purse to still carry protection at all times. Personally, Dish would be more embarrassed to be seen wearing a pager than carrying a condom, but we're pretty weird.

Fear Into Fun?: Dish had heard about the presence of a Straight Pride group at Emory, which bunch of folks we assumed to be as dour and mirthless as most of their type are. But then a friend brought us the photo of a sign for a meeting of the group early last November. These guys (we assume they are men, with a name like H.U.N.G.) may not be very pro-gay, but at least they have enough perspective on their own hangups to make a (little) joke about them. Dish would like to propose a support group for H.U.N.G. members who are able to transcend their fear of fags: UNHUNG-UP.

Stranger than Fiction: Dish thinks that we've not even begun to hear all the weirdness, claims and counterclaims that we're likely to hear in the Michael Jackson case. Folks seem to be lining up on both sides of the fence. One of the strangest demos of support that we've seen is an ad taken out by Maximilian Schell in "The Hollywood Reporter." The full page public letter to Jackson (in Schell's own handwriting) claims that he is "deeply ashamed" of the media's treatment of Jackson and that when he once met Michael he "...looked into your eyes—THEY WERE KIND." Whoa, Max. Take it easy fella, grab a Pepsi and chill out.

A Wing and a Prayer: There seems to be more than a little posing and posturing about the U.S. military establishment and extremist politics. First there comes word (in the form of a letter from P-FLAG national president to Bill Clinton) that the Air Force Band Wings of Blue and the Air Force Chorale performed recently at the dedication of the new Colorado Springs headquarters of the rabidly right wing Focus on the Family. Dish is not amused by the fact that our tax dollars contributed to this extravaganza of self-righteous rectitude, but we do think that it would be all right if the same band and chorus would perform, say, at the Stonewall 25 celebration in New York City next June. After all, isn't freedom about equal opportunity?

Rush to Judgement: Then there's the minor stink a few weeks ago about the fact that Armed Forces Radio hasn't been carrying Rush (The Rabid) Limbaugh's daily hatefest disguised as a talk show. Seems that our old friend Rep. Robert Dornan and the charming Sen. John Warner (didn't Liz teach him anything?) have bullied the network into carrying the show even though just .02 percent of those military personnel interviewed wanted to waste their time on this drivel. We hope that Rep. Barney Frank and Sen. Diane Fienstein will now raise hell about the fact that Armed Forces Radio and TV don't carry any lesbian/gay shows. Again, we think that equal opportunity is the operative angle here.

From the Sublime to the Camp: On a slightly more touching note, there's this quote from Boy George on the occasion of the release of his recent greatest hits CD: "I'd like to thank Mum, Dad and the rest of my family for making me the twisted, confused queen that I am."

DECEMBER 23 - DECEMBER 29, 1993

We are now officially into the winter season. Christmas is on Saturday and the full moon follows on the 28th. The sun is in the cardinal earth sign of Capricorn, signifying a time of internal growth and development along with planning and visioning for the near future. A good time to reflect and write down ideas.

ARIES, your job/career may need more of your focus and attention, even during the holidays. Just go with the flow and be as patient as you can be with misunderstandings or difficulties that have fallen into your lap. TAURUS, Jupiter is expanding your possibilities with partnerships, close personal relationships and important new friendships. Take your time, get to know people before you jump in with both feet, even if your loneliness is driving you. GEMINI, 'tis the season to be jolly. So, you might want to spread your cheer and good humor by participating in some kind of community effort to assist those less fortunate. If some of your friends are in the dumps, then organize a drop-in party for all.

CANCER, the full moon on the 28th is in your birth sign, enhancing your excellent intuitive sense, especially about people and possibly amplifying your dreams. Be sure to get enough rest, regular exercise and good food over the holidays. Have fun. LEO, if you are bored with your job or you are now considering a career change, then begin preparations now, but it may be best to wait until spring to take action unless you get a spectacular offer or opportunity. In the meantime, relax. VIRGO, this is the perfect time to heal old wounds, especially ones from holidays past. You also have the ability to mend rifts that exist in current relationships and to experience major insights and growth in your own spiritual journey.

LIBRA, if you find yourself running from one task or appointment to the other and falling into bed at night without any time for yourself, then you definitely need to reschedule a few things so you will have quality personal time this week. SCOR-PIO, how's life in the Big City? If you are feeling the least bit of emotional overwhelm, part of it could be from your sensitivity to the collective thoughts and feelings of all those folks living close together. You may need a short trip. SAGITTARIUS, hopefully you had a wonderful birthday month with lots of fun activities and good times with friends. Well, don't stop now. As you know, this beautiful planet is running a little short on fun, good times and joy. Keep up the good work.

CAPRICORN, happy birthday to you. With the sun and five other planets all moving through your birth sign, you can be very focused, very energetic and accomplish a great deal. However, be sure you have time for friends and activities you really enjoy. AQUARIUS, your intuition and dreamtime may be superactive right now, making it difficult to deal with mundane matters and to keep up with things that seem trivial. This won't last too long, but do take advantage of any information coming through. PISCES, this is an excellent time for you to play, plan parties, go to movies and just generally have a wonderful time. Compassion and empathy for others are very good qualities, but they do need to be balanced with good times and fun activities.

KATIE MAJORS

Age: 16

How long in Atlanta: Off and on all my life

Last Book Read:

"Catcher in the Rye" by J.D. Salinger

Favorite Pastime: Sports Pet Peeve: Uncut salads

Katie Majors is growing up gay. And for her, it's not been difficult so far at all. Of course, having cool parents may help-she lives in a Candler Park home that is part museum and part junk shop with her father, local artist Lou Majors and stepmother, junkman's daughter and tchotchka queen Pam Majors-and her mother, Karen Smith, is a lesbian.

"I figured it out [about my mother] when I was about 12," Majors says. "I thought her lover was my aunt for the longest time. I didn't see them that often, and they were never sexual or anything around me."

Majors' sister set the record straight, so to speak, and two years later, Majors' herself came out.

"My mom was the first person I told," she says. "It was easiest for me to talk to her."

She had already discussed homosexuality with her mother, but the new development changed their relationship.

"We talked a lot more once I came out," Majors says, "because there was some kind of connection.

Majors is growing up gay, all right-in a way most of the lesbian/gay community has always dreamed of.

"For the most part, my family is like, 'do what you want to do, we'll love you no matter what," she continues. "And my friends-I didn't lose any friends because of it. I got further away from some friends, but nothing that really negatively impacted me."

Fitting in with fellow teens is a little difficult, she explains, because her interests are different from those of her peers, and many of her friends are older.

"I can notice a difference between me and my schoolmates," she says, "because I hang out with so many different people. Sometimes if I try to go out with my friends from school, it's a lot harder for me because they do a lot of things that I'm just not into. Like I'm not going to go out with a group of girls to cruise for guys.'

But she never feels pressured to fit in. "It's really weird," she explains, "because they're all like, 'it's OK because she's Katie.' I'm kind of my own little group-here's teens, here's adults, and here's Katie. But it is hard to go from the weekends when I'm hanging out with older people back to school days.'

Majors attends Horizon School, where she plays soccer and basketball. Sports play a big part in her life these days-she'd like to play on the college level when she graduates high school.

"I'm not really into watching sports, I just like to play," she explains. "I've just been playing team sports lately, but before when I'd be with my friends we would play-basketball, soccer, baseball."

Soccer tops the list—and she will watch that

"Over at Candler Park a bunch of Hispanic teams play on Sunday, and I like to watch them."

Horizon is an alternative school, and as such seems an ideal choice for a teenager like Majors. Just last week, the school's students put on a play, "More Than Just a Word," about social justice. It's a presentation the school has done for the past three years, with most of its script written by the students. Majors was one of the student actors.

"It's about what we think is wrong with society and what needs to change," she says.

Majors has a strong focus on social justice issues, which she says has increased since she came out.

"It's just been a part of my life for the past two years," she explains. "And I've been involved with some marches-I went to the March On Washington."

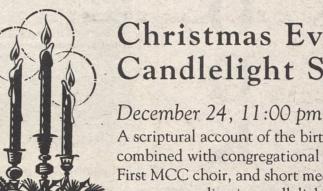

Majors was 15 when she travelled to Washington, and she says it was quite an experience.

"It was so neat," she says. "To see us everywhere, to feel safe at night. And when you got on the Metro, they'd be full of us, and you'd see heterosexual couples [cringing].'

Quite a life, this growing up gay. And Majors keeps a positive outlook on the future—she believes there's nothing she can't do.

"It's not like I haven't ever had a problem," she says with a smile, "but I just want to be happy and stuff. And I created it all for myself."
